The Harvest collection celebrates nature in the countryside. The colors: honey, hops, hemp, wicker and sesame are balanced by mint green and lavender in solids and prints. The simplicity of a gardening outfit which is roomy and supple and bares the arms and neck, provides comfort with wide skirts and unstructured jackets. Inspired by the painter Millet's The Gleaners, the Harvest collection is a gentle return to the simpler, quieter styles of nature.

Miami is an exuberant carnival of pastel pairings. Pink flamingos take flight from beds of hibiscus. Ocean blues and glittery crystal shades. Candy colors of mint green, pinkest pink, marmalade. The drama of the tropical south is played out in a tailored jacket and bermuda shorts combo. Wrap skirts and pants suits in shantung evoke the glamor of Miami at its dramatic best in the fifties. Big novelty collars and long chiffon scarves add to the romance.

Roots is a return to Africa in big, bold, mysterious brown and black prints. Relaxed, natural fabrics drape into blouson and long, straight sleeveless dresses. Cotton and printed rayon, softly finished in peachskin add a nonchalantly elegant look. Fawn and blush colors are highlighted with ecru and white and turned brilliant with Polynesian prints of hot fuchsia, essential green and classic blue.

Spring and summer of '94 promises to produce cool, classic comfort for the fashion-conscious woman.

Syria assures Canada it will stop pogrom

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — Canada has received assurances from authorities in Damascus that Syria's remaining 1,100 Jews will be protected against a pogrom threatened for this Sunday.

Canada's ambassador to Syria, John McNee, met Monday with officials in the Syrian Foreign Ministry and was told that authorities have taken "measures" to protect the country's Jews, Foreign Affairs spokesman Rodney Moore told The CJN Monday morning.

Moore could not elaborate on what those measures are.

For much of last week, the Canadian Embassy in Damascus was trying to verify letters sent to every Jewish home and business in Syria, stating that "the blood of all Jews living in Syria will be spilled" starting March 13, which marks the end of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan.

The letters, written in Arabic, threaten retaliation for the Feb. 25 massacre of Muslim worshippers at a Hebron mosque. "You only shoot your enemies when they are praying," it said. "We are going to take revenge from you... You will see that Hitler was weak in comparison [to] what we will do to you," states an English translation provided to The CJN.

The notes are signed by the Syrian Muslim Party of Justice.

Moore wouldn't say whether the letters were found to be authentic, but he did state that Ottawa "is taking threats of this type seriously," and that Monday's meeting between the Syrians and McNee was a formal diplomatic step on the part of Canada.

Canada has a long-standing policy of pressing Syria to allow Jews to leave the country.

"Our representations won't cease until all Syrian Jews can leave," Moore added.

Jews in Syria are "hysterical" and "petrified" as a result of the letters, according to Judy Feld Carr, head of Canadian Jewish Congress's National Task Force for Syrian Jews. "I treat this letter with great seriousness," she added.

Carr said Canada informed the U.S. State Department of the letters.

Last week, U.S. administration officials said they had never heard of the letter's signatory.

Carr has called on rabbis, task force members and the community at large to send faxes and telegrams to Foreign Affairs Minister Andre Ouellet, asking for Canada's intervention.

The Australian ambassador to Syria will also raise the issue of granting exit visas to Jews, Carr said.

Most of the country's Jews have exit visas allowing them to travel, mainly to the United States. Syrian authorities, however, have been splitting families, with many young children being denied the documents, Carr claimed.

Hebron Jews' future debated

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — A sizable number of Israeli cabinet ministers favor the forcible dismantling of the Jewish settlements inside the West Bank city of Hebron.

They favor the measure because of fears there will be further violence in Hebron following the Feb. 25 murders of 30 Palestinians at the Tomb of the Patriarchs.

Israeli settlers and their political supporters reacted with rage at reports suggesting that seven out of nine ministers who spoke at the weekly cabinet meeting last Sunday support removing the approximately 400 settlers currently living among 70,000 Palestinians in Hebron.

A spokesman for the Hebron settlers, Noam Arnon, said a decision to dismantle the settlements was "inconceivable."

Rehavam Ze'evi, leader of the right-wing Moledet party, said it would spell "the end of Zionism."

West Bank settlement leaders said there would be a widescale campaign of civil disobedience if the government made any attempt to evict the Hebron settlers.

Environment Minister Yossi Sarid of the left-wing Meretz party said it was possible the decision would be taken at this Sunday's cabinet meeting.

There are 42 Jewish families living in three closely guarded sites inside Hebron: Beit Hadassah, Tel Romeida and the Avraham Avinu Synagogue complex. And about 150 youngsters study at a yeshiva in the city.

Some residents are affiliated with the Kach and Kahane Chai movements.

Residents are guarded by Israel Defence Force troops night and day.

One of the two ministers who opposed the eviction of the Hebron settlers, Agriculture Minister Yakov Tsur, said that he, like the majority of the ministers, was opposed in principle to any Jewish settlements in the heart of Hebron.

But, he said, ordering the evictions now would send "the wrong message, a message of caving in" to the Palestinians.

The other minister opposing the move, Economic Minister Shimon Sheetrit, said that evicting the settlers would fly in the face of the self-rule accord, which specifically put off the issue of settlements to a later time.

Several cabinet ministers, especially those with dovish leanings, called for sterner action against anti-Arab extremists.

The army has issued five administrative detention orders against leaders of extremist movements. Two of them have been apprehended.

Over the weekend, the army announced that an unspecified number of anti-Arab extremists would no longer be called for reserve duty, adding that their army-issued weapons would soon be impounded.

N.Y. Lubavitcher student dies after drive-by shooting

CJN wire services

NEW YORK — Lubavitcher student Aaron Halberstam was buried on Sunday after succumbing to wounds suffered in an attack on a van carrying 15 Orthodox students on the Brooklyn Bridge.

Halberstam, 16, died in St. Vincent's Hospital with his family around him. He had been declared brain dead by doctors one day after the March 1 attack in which the van was sprayed with gunfire. He had been kept on life support systems in accordance with his family's wishes.

Three other students were injured in the attack. Nachum Sossonkin, 18, was in critical condition following surgery.

Yaakov Schapiro, a third victim, was treated for minor wounds to the head and hands and released, while the fourth victim, Levi Wilhelm, was in stable condition in hospital with a bullet wound to the buttocks.

The incident occurred when the van was shot at by a gunman in a car as it approached the Brooklyn Bridge on the Manhattan side. The car pursued the van and fired at it two more times.

The van was part of a convoy accompanying Lubavitcher Rebbe Menachem Schneerson back to the Crown Heights area of Brooklyn after successful eye surgery in Manhattan.

Within one day of the assault, police charged Rashad Baz, a 28-year-old Lebanese national, with 15 counts of attempted murder, various assault charges and numerous weapons violations. Baz had entered the United States in 1984 on a student visa.

Police impounded the suspect's car, a 1978 Chevrolet Impala, as well as a cache of weapons that included a submachine pistol, a semi-automatic shotgun and 50 rounds of ammunition.

Police commissioner William Bratton said in a news conference that preliminary ballistic tests linked the weapons, which were found in Baz's car, with the shooting. Police declined to comment on a possible motive for the attack or say whether it was linked to the Hebron mosque shooting in which more than 30 Muslims were killed.

Officials at the news conference, which included Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, would also not comment on whether the suspect was tied to any group, although they did say they were questioning other individuals.

The alleged gunman was apprehended by police after he left his car in a Brooklyn body shop to have its window repaired. Someone from the body shop tipped off police that a vehicle matching the description of a blue car with a shattered window, had been left in the shop. The window was apparently shattered when the suspect fired through it and into the van.

Giuliani praised the Jewish community for its co-operation in the incident and he called on New Yorkers not to view the shootings along racial lines.

"This act of evil is not the act of a people," he said. "It's the act of a person or persons."

Commissioner Bratton said members of the Arab American community gave "significant" assistance in locating the suspect.

Jewish leaders met with Giuliani in a closed session last week to discuss the case and what the Jewish community can

Associated campus may open in August

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Associated Hebrew Day Schools' board of directors have voted to go ahead with the construction of the $10-million Thornhill campus, with a view to open the building for classes by this August.

The board last week voted to accept a recommendation to complete the school, either in time for the next academic year or by next January, which translates into a sigh of relief for hundreds of parents north of Steeles Avenue.

"We are going to resume building and build as quickly as possible," Associated president Harry Krakowsky told The CJN last week. "We don't know if it [will be ready] by Sept. 1, but that's we're aiming for."

Because of the early High Holidays this year, classes for Jewish day school students begin at the end of August. That means the campus would have to be ready, or at least usable, by mid-August in order to move in furnishings and equipment, Krakowsky said.

"It didn't make any sense not to go ahead" with construction, he added. "Not proceeding costs money too."

The 100,000-sq. ft. building, at Atkinson Avenue and Rosedale Heights Boulevard, is currently closed in with a roof, walls, floors and windows. Mechanical and heating systems are roughed in.

According to building chair Lou Greenbaum, about $5 million has already been spent on construction.

School officials are not considering the provincial Ministry of Housing's rejection of a joint bid by Associated and the Baycrest Centre to construct senior housing on Associated's Neptune campus site a setback. Approval of the bid was said to be a key factor in whether the Thornhill campus would be completed sooner rather than later.

Krakowsky said the application was turned down because "we didn't meet the criteria." He said the bid will be resubmitted by the March 15 deadline and both he and Greenbaum said they are confident it will be approved.

Linked to other projects

The Thornhill campus is still linked to several other Associated projects:

- Renovating the Hurwich (Finch) campus to accommodate a junior high school;
- Renovating the Danilack (Leslie) branch to accommodate Associated's administrative offices, which are now at the Neptune campus;
- Tearing down the Neptune campus to replace it with a smaller building that will house a pre-school and elementary classes. Part of the site would be sold to a non-profit housing corporation for the seniors project (provided the government's approval comes through).

The sale of the Neptune site was expected to bring in about $4 million, while the various renovations are estimated to cost between $2 million and $3 million.

In the meantime, Neptune classes will resume there in August and stay until a deal is struck. When the building is finally knocked down, students will go to rented, temporary quarters for one year, Krakowsky explained. "But there is absolutely going to be a new school there," he stressed.

A few months ago, when the bid on Neptune was still before Queen's Park, Associated's board of directors authorized bank borrowing of up to $2.5 million toward the Thornhill campus. That sum, in addition to the $2.5 million it had in pledges and the $4 million expected from the Neptune site, meant the new branch was on prudent footing, officials said.

But last week, the board revised its figures. It is now authorized to borrow up to $6.5 million in order to finish the school, Krakowsky said.

Some parents who attended an information meeting on the Thornhill campus in January said they would be willing to pay more in tuition fees to ensure the school's completion.

In the meantime, said Krakowsky and Greenbaum, Associated will continue with an "aggressive" fundraising campaign.

A worst-case scenario, said Krakowsky, would be Associated "being stuck" with the Neptune campus for a few years, before finally selling it.

He said Associated won't have more debt than any other Jewish day school in Metro.

Greenbaum said the school's debt can be handled because of the equity in the Neptune site.

A meeting on whether tuition at the Thornhill campus will be hiked will be held next month.

New skinhead group eyes Toronto

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An American-based skinhead group with a reputation for violence is attempting to set up shop in Toronto, according to two Jewish organizations which monitor racist activities.

The Northern Hammerskins, a coalition of skinheads with branches across North America, has been recruiting young people who are shifting allegiances from the Church of the Creator and the Heritage Front, said Canadian Jewish Congress spokesman Bernie Farber and Josh Schwarcz, Ontario director of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights.

The Church of the Creator (COTC) has "lost its cool" among young people because prominent COTC figures are facing criminal charges arising from a number of incidents, Schwarcz said.

In addition, members of the Heritage Front, including its leader Wolfgang Droege, are also facing criminal charges, as well as an action under the Canadian Human Rights Act for its telephone hotline.

"The Heritage Front and COTC have lost their appeal to some extent due to these arrests and judicial proceedings that have caused them tremendous grief," Farber said. "They're too busy defending the action to recruit."

The Northern Hammerskins, he continued, "are short on philosophy and long on violence. They have enticed young people to join."

Farber said the group is "young with little structure and with violence as part of their credo."

The group is "hardcore, openly racist, violent," said Schwarcz.

A recent concert held in a hall on Danforth Avenue attracted about 50 young people — as well as several uniformed police, Schwarcz said.

A New Jersey band that was to have performed, called Aggravated Assault, was deterred from entering Canada after Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi announced they would be stopped at the border, Farber said.

A local band, White Riot, took their place.

Det. Steve Irwin of the Metro hate crimes unit said police "were aware [of the concert] and did monitor what took place." He said it is routine for uniformed officers to enter premises to check on liquor licenses and to see that a hall is not overcrowded.

Irwin pointed out the concert was originally booked for the basement of a Roman Catholic Church but that the priest who took the booking did not know it was for an event involving racist bands. He cancelled it when police informed him about the event, and concert organizers then staged it in the Danforth Avenue hall that last year was booked for a celebration marking Hitler's birthday.

Efrat rabbi denounces Hebron massacre

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —There is no possible justification for the massacre at Hebron, asserts Rabbi Shlomo Riskin, chief rabbi of Efrat and a personal friend of Dr. Baruch Goldstein, the gunman who on Purim burst into the mosque at the Cave of Machpelah and killed 30 Arabs at prayer, before being himself killed.

"The act was unforgivable and reprehensible," Rabbi Riskin said. He was giving the David and Lois Buckstein Endowed Lecture at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

"There is no justification for a Jew slaying an Arab while he is in the midst of prayer, or for raising a hand against an Arab who has not raised his hand against you," he said.

Calling it a day that "changed Purim and may change Jewish reality for generations to come," he said that "what Goldstein did is a desecration of G-d's name, with untold ramifications for Israel and the world."

This view of the event is shared by the rabbinate of Israel, including the Chief Rabbi, and by most of the settlers in the territories, Rabbi Riskin said.

However, the rabbi told the hushed audience of nearly 300 people, one must understand the context of the act.

Baruch Goldstein, he said, was "not merely a fanatical Kachnik: in fact, he was called the tzaddik of Kiryat Arba. He never refused a call from either an Arab or a Jew (until last year, when he stopped treating Arabs), and he treated everyone with skill and compassion."

Rabbi Shlomo Riskin

In fact, Rabbi Riskin noted, in the chaos of the massacre, before it was known who the gunman was, "the call went out for Dr. Baruch Goldstein."

What happened, Rabbi Riskin believes, is that "he snapped." First, there was the killing of 33 and wounding of over 300 Israelis after the Oslo accord "and the handshake" by Arab terrorists.

Even worse, said Rabbi Riskin, was the murder of Mordechai Lapid, Goldstein's best friend, and his son Shlomo, "the most brilliant student I ever taught."

Shlomo Lapid had left his yeshivah training to go to the army, where he was headed with his father at his death.

"Baruch Goldstein was the one who declared his best friend and his best friend's son dead in his arms."

Insanity, the rabbi repeated, is no excuse for such an act, but "if we don't understand what happened, there is no chance for reaching a peace."

The Arabs have also done terrible things, the rabbi said, citing the 21 children killed at Ma'alot in 1974, the 22 worshippers killed in a synagogue in Istanbul in 1986, and the 14 people, including two young Canadian women, killed on the Tel Aviv to Jerusalem bus in 1989.

The Israeli government and rabbinate, with only a very few exceptions, expressed contrition for Goldstein's act.

Rabbi Riskin and the mayor of Efrat, in fact, went to see the muktar (village elder) of the neighboring Arab village, to express their condolences and their shame.

But when Israelis or other Jews were killed, "the Arab world only urged more killing."

"It is only when the Arab world responds with the same contrition and revulsion as we did that there is a chance for peace."

The Arabs, he said, are trying to paint all the settlers as extremists. That, the rabbi insisted, is wrong. "The majority are moderates, who serve in the army, support the state, and use arms only for self-protection."

Most of them don't, he said, share the philosophy of Kach, which he called "a lunatic fringe."

There is no place for a Judaism that is racist, that sees gentiles and Arabs as inferior beings, he affirmed.

Rabbi Riskin believes that it is possible for Jews to live in peace with Arabs, as is the case between Efrat and the neighboring Arab village. No one, he said, should be asked — or forced — to give up their home.

'Arafat is wrong partner for peace'

Arafat, he said, is the wrong partner to have chosen for peace. He is a terrorist, the rabbi said, and "when you give such a victory to a terrorist, you are giving a victory to terrorism."

Arafat supports the right of return for Arabs, which, the rabbi said, "would mean the return of millions of Arabs to Jerusalem, Jaffa, and Hebron. It would be the death knell of the Jewish state"

Most important, he said, is that "Arafat has not kept one single agreement he has made with anyone, including Arab states."

We should be proud Jews, he said, proud that in spite of the act of a madman, we have responded in a way the Arab world has never responded (to our tragedies.)

It is essential, he reiterated, that the entire settlement movement must not be discredited. Where once the moral and actual leadership of the military and the country came from the non-religious kibbutzim, he said, now it is from the hesder yeshivot, those institutions that combine Torah study with military service. The settlers in the territories, he said, are part of this trend.

In an interview with The CJN the next morning, Rabbi Riskin said that he and the other settlers are citizens of Israel, just as much legitimate settlers as those who first came to Tel Aviv.

It is unfair, he said, to lump the settlers into one ideological framework. "The prime minister just took a poll that said that only 35 per cent of the people of Israel are in favor of the Oslo agreement. The settlers are just as divided as the rest of the population."

The settlers will not be disarmed, as some are suggesting they should be, he said. "As citizens of Israel, who serve in the army, they have to be armed, especially when the wrath of Hamas is directed most against the settlers."

When asked what the settlers would do if the army tried to force them to disarm or to move, — neither of which, he insisted, could happen — Rabbi Riskin replied that "every Israeli has a red line — not to raise a hand against the Israel Defence Force."

Jewish groups, leaders receive .22-calibre bullets in the mail

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Metro Toronto Police are paying special attention to Jewish facilities and individuals who received live, .22-calibre bullets in the mail last week.

In a new and frightening twist to anti-Semitic mail, between nine and 12 of the bullets were sent to several Jewish communal organization, including Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and B'nai Brith Canada (BBC).

The bullets arrived wrapped in paper, with no notes, and enclosed in envelopes addressed in child-like block letters.

In some instances, cancelled stamps were used on the envelopes. The stamps were glued on.

The matter has been passed to the Metro Police Hate Crime Unit.

The slugs contain no markings and are "virtually impossible" to trace, Det. Steve Irwin told The CJN. But they are being treated for fingerprints, he added.

"We're treating this as the serious crime it is. A lot of [methods] are available to us," Irwin said.

CJC has a suspect in mind, someone with a history of sending vicious anti-Semitic messages through the mails, said Bernie Farber, director of the community relations committee.

That person is being investigated along with several others, Irwin noted.

Farber said he believes the sending of the bullets has "no connection" to the recent slaying by a Jewish settler of 39 Palestinians at the Hebron mosque.

Police have stepped up their patrols of Jewish facilities, Farber added.

He said he has a few questions for Canada Post, namely, how live bullets get through the mails, and how previously-used stamps can be employed.

BB executive vice-president Frank Dimant said he thinks events in Hebron were the "catalyst" behind the incident.

"But it's really a locally motivated thing," he noted.

Both Congress and BB praised Metro Police for the way in which the case is being handled.

Maccabi World Union seeks funds for global projects

Col. Ilan Egozi (third from left) met with several Maccabi Canada officials while visiting Montreal, including (from left) Quebec chair David Vineberg, Quebec fundraising chair Stephen Favor and national fundraising chair Gordon Schwartz.

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Canada and other countries affiliated with the Maccabi World Union (MWU), the governing body overseeing the Maccabiah Games, will be part of a new initiative to establish an international fundraising and programming profile.

So said Ilan Egozi, the MWU's director of fundraising, during a recent visit to Montreal.

In an interview, Egozi, a 49-year-old Israeli veteran, admitted that this new effort to galvanize more of a "global" program for MWU countries is long past due.

Despite MWU's venerable age — about 90 years old — Egozi is the governing body's first-ever fundraising professional.

Why so late coming?

Because, says Egozi, the MWU has deservedly had a reputation for not co-ordinating itself all that efficiently.

"Not all Maccabi countries," he says, "have been well-defined. There has been no real sense of the international movement because countries, understandably, have had to focus on their own needs."

Now, the MWU is starting to get its act together in terms of trying to create more mutually-supportive links among MWU member nations, and to enhance the movement's founding principles of sports and education among the world's Jewish youth.

One of the first priorities, Egozi said, will be to raise $150,000 in "emergency" funding to build 13 Maccabi centres in Russia.

This project has to get off the ground soon, Egozi says, to be eligible for promised Israeli government matching funding and because it is not known how long Russia will give the "green light" for the centres.

The MWU also wants to bring more sports and education programs to Turkey, Hungary, and France and "wherever Jewish communities exist."

The international effort will work both ways. Egozi said the MWU will help individual nations in their own fundraising efforts while Maccabi countries will give support to the MWU. The funds raised will subsidize more athletes, pay for more international competitions and for visits to Israel by Maccabi athletes for sports and education programs.

Those last two ingredients, in Egozi's mind, remain the most useful tools in bringing "youngsters and a Jewish identity together."

As it is, the MWU does not come by its funding easily. According to Egozi, there is no set budget. Funding for the Maccabiah and Maccabi activities in Israel comes from the Israel government and through a national lottery. The Jewish Agency pays for Maccabi shlichim.

But the MWU is basically on its own when it comes to getting money together for putting international programs into place.

Canada has been one of the first countries Egozi has visited since taking on the job at the conclusion of the last Maccabiah in July, and he has been impressed after meeting with Maccabi Canada officials in Montreal.

Maccabi Canada, he said, seems to have a solid infrastructure in place and has been at the forefront in supporting its Jewish athletes. "It thinks at a higher level."

Egozi also plans to visit other Maccabi nations to learn about their operations, to galvanize the international fundraising and programming efforts, and also to get his own feet wet. He got what he considers good training for his current job as a shaliach for the Jewish National Fund in London, England. "But for me, Maccabi is very new."

Another major part of Egozi's work will be to raise the public relations profile of the Maccabi movement.

This aspect of the MWU is vital to the success of its new initiative but has historically been neglected, Egozi says, due to other priorities and a lack of resources and co-ordination.

Next month, MWU officials will be taking part in a conference at Haifa University to help develop new MWU educational programs.

Another step, hopes Egozi, towards bringing the movement's ideals closer to Jewish youth around the world.

Israeli Olympic skater finishes 16th

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The audience in Norway liked it; the announcers doing the color commentary on TV were tickled pink by it; friends and colleagues back in Israel and in Canada admired it too. Unfortunately, the judges at rinkside who evaluated it were not that impressed.

Putting aside any admiration they might have felt for the plucky figure skater representing Israel, they awarded Misha Shmerkin mediocre marks in the high "4s" (out of a perfect mark of 6.0) for both technical merit and artistic impression in the men's figure skating competition at the recently concluded Olympic Winter Games in Lillehammer, Norway.

The scores were good for a 16th place finish.

Shmerkin was a little disappointed by the marks and his final placing, said Yossi Goldberg, head of the Israeli Figure Skating Association (IFSA). Speaking in a telephone interview from Metulla, where he also serves as mayor, Goldberg said Shmerkin had hoped to finish somewhere around 10th.

Although he did not meet that goal, the 24-year-old skater did serve notice to a world audience that winter sports and Israel, though hardly synonymous, are not beyond the realm of the possible.

Shmerkin, meanwhile, is continuing to train in Russia in the hopes of recording an even better showing at the upcoming World Championships in Tokyo, Japan.

In Norway, Shmerkin found himself in 15th place following the compulsory skate, just ahead of Canadian champion Kurt Browning. His free skate program was long on artistic interpretation but short on the spectacular jumps and fast footwork expected of top skaters.

Towards the start of his program, Shmerkin landed a triple axel — barely — and he later hung on to avoid hitting the ice on a triple toe loop jump. He startled the color commentators on CBS with a second triple axel that was not originally part of the program (a hand on the ice prevented him from crashing on landing) and he also managed to complete another triple toe loop without any major disaster.

When it was all over the audience gave the Odessa-born skater a warm ovation. As the cameras panned to capture IFSA chief Goldberg clapping enthusiastically, one commentator quipped that the Israeli skating hierarchy has no problems holding meetings. "He and Misha have lunch."

Shmerkin's participation at the winter games was a first for Israel. Though the Jewish state has participated in many Summer Olympics, his participation marked the first time Israel sent a "team" to the winter event. Naturally, Shmerkin carried Israel's flag at the opening ceremonies and a closeup of him after his free skate showed a gold Magen David dangling around his neck.

Israelis who tuned in to the Eurosport TV network were able to follow Shmerkin's skating live, while the Israeli print media carried stories about him on a daily basis, Goldberg said.

While the idea of an Israeli in the winter games is currently something of a novelty, the Jewish state may be represented by other elite athletes in future winter games, Goldberg suggested.

There were other Jewish sportsmen at the Olympics, he said, but when pressed, he declined to say who they were or what country or countries they represented. He would only say that one athlete is planning to make aliyah to Israel this summer. If that person requests it, he will get a job at Canada Centre, he added.

Canada Centre is the skating and recreational complex in Metulla that was built with funds allocated by the United Israel Appeal of Canada. Goldberg said he expects construction of a new Olympic-size skating and hockey rink will be completed there sometime in 1994.

UN rights body recognizes reality of anti-Semitism

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two senior officials of B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) noted small but significant changes when they attended proceedings last month of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights.

A resolution on combatting racism, for example, mentioned in its preamble "racism, racial discrimination, anti-Semitism, xenophobia and related intolerance."

Despite the fact that the inclusion of anti-Semitism in the list provoked a lengthy, heated debate, "the fact that it got this far is important," Paul Marcus, director of BBC's Institute for International Affairs, told The CJN in a recent interview. "The fact that the whole UN has been seized with the issue is important."

Marcus, who attended the meetings with Brian Morris, BBC vice-president and institute chair, also noted the significance of Turkey, a Muslim country, having introduced the resolution as lead sponsor.

"The experience of this century and particularly the Holocaust makes it imperative [to include anti-Semitism]," said Marcus. "Anti-Semitism is not easily captured by the term 'racism.' Because of the religious connotations, anti-Semitism is a unique phenomenon. Anti-Semitism is the most ancient hatred and the UN [was] silent on it. It's a very important word."

"You have to go very slowly," noted Morris. "It's year by year. It's very much creeping diplomacy."

B'nai Brith also had concerns about the wording used in resolutions regarding Israel. Marcus noted "a significant alteration of the language" in reference to the Jewish state.

He pointed out that a reference to "concentration camps" for Palestinians in a 1993 resolution was changed to "detention camps." He also noted that many resolutions contained positive references to the peace process.

"Israel is moving to be more of a full participant [in the UN], rather than a bystander," Marcus said.

Of the countries represented at the commission, the United States is the most vocal supporter of Israel, he noted.

"We would like to see Canada be more vocal. We believe that they play an important role behind the scenes and have a lot of credibility."

He noted that Canada was supportive on the issue of anti-Semitism, but added that it is "troubling that [Canada] voted in favor of [the resolution against] Israeli settlements [in the territories]." Canada abstained on the issue of self-determination for Palestinians.

"I think it's very important now that the Jewish community send information on anti-Semitism to the [UN's] special rapporteur on racism and related issues," said Marcus, noting that the rapporteur position was created only last year in what he termed "a very significant step."

In addition to attending the UN sessions as representatives of the Co-ordinating Board of Jewish Organisations (made up of B'nai Brith International, the Board of Deputies of British Jews and the South African Jewish Board of Deputies), Marcus and Morris met with officials of the International Red Cross and Red Crescent Movement, as well as with the Israeli and Canadian ambassadors and with members of Geneva's 2,000 family Jewish community (there are 5,000 Jewish families in all of Switzerland).

Issues discussed with Red Cross officials included Israel's version of the organization — Magen David Adom, which is not recognized by the international movement — Israeli servicemen listed as Missing in Action and documents held by the Red Cross containing the names of many Jews killed at Auschwitz.

But most of the BBC officials' time was spent discussing Magen David Adom. The Red Cross agreed to study the issue of recognizing the Magen David Adom, which uses the Star of David in its emblem, said Marcus.

Currently, the International Red Cross and Red Crescent Movement accepts only the cross and crescent as its official emblems. Because both symbols have religious implications, B'nai Brith rejected a Red Cross suggestion that a third, neutral symbol be introduced for those countries not wishing to use either of the two existing symbols.

"If there was one neutral symbol for everybody, that would be acceptable," Marcus said.

"By accepting the Red Crescent, the universality they were striving for [was lost]," Morris said. "They are being hypocritical and I would say anti-Semitic." A symbol has to be accepted by a majority of countries in a vote, Morris said.

Marcus acknowledged that the Red Cross has "some valid concerns. When you add emblems, there's a risk there won't be that recognition factor, but it's clear there's already a multiplicity of emblems, and they're acting to exclude a group."

Marcus and Morris found that local B'nai Brith members share such concerns as assimilation and right-wing extremism with their overseas counterparts.

The Swiss parliament recently passed a law forbidding public manifestations of hate, said Marcus, but the law will be put to a referendum because thousands of signatures were collected in opposition to it. Local B'nai Brith chapters are encouraging people to vote against the referendum, Marcus reports.

The local rate of intermarriage is over 85 per cent, Morris was told. "I was shocked at the rate of assimilation."

It was the local community's own prediction, Morris said, that by the year 2020 there would no longer be a Jewish community in Geneva. He noted that the Israeli ambassador there disagrees, because community members are strong supporters of Israel. The city has three synagogues and a kosher bakery/supermarket.

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

ALTER — LACHAVICH — CREEK — GAD

Helen Lockwood of Toronto has presented me with a wholesale order to research four names: Gad, Alter, Lachavich and Creek.

Alter, more commonly a given name than a surname, literally means "the old one." It was bestowed on a seriously ill child to deceive the Angel of Death if the name of the sick child was on his list.

Lachavich has two possible sources, from the village Lyachewick in White Russia or Lyakovitse in the Ukraine.

Creek was probably Krik, which, in turn, emanates from either Krug (a jug) or Krieg (a quarrel).

Gad derives from Hadas or Hadassah, the Hebrew word for myrtle. It has yielded many surnames. The most familiar is probably Adaskin. My friend David Ades owes his name to the same source.

Other variations are: Hodel, Godel and Udel; Hodes, Godes and Godin; Adesman and Gudesman; Adinov, Adkin.

Nathan Sharony

Nathan Sharony, 59, has some big shoes to fill. On Jan. 18, Sharony succeeded Meir Rosenne, whose five-year term was generally regarded as highly successful, as president and chief executive officer of State of Israel Bonds. However, Sharony has equally impressive credentials.

Born in Petach Tikvah, Sharony joined the Israel Defence Force in 1952 and rose to the rank of major-general. He was commander of the military corps and chief of staff of the southern command. He is a veteran of the 1956 Sinai campaign, the 1967 Six Day War, the 1969 War of Attrition and the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

After retiring from the IDF, Sharony entered the private sector as a vice-president of logistics for Tadiran Electronics Industry Ltd., one of Israel's leading electronics firms. Subsequently, he became president and CEO of Electro Optical Industries Ltd.

In 1992, Sharony was named director-general of Israel's Ministry of Industry and Trade. Although he moved to New York with his wife Zelda to head up Bonds, his permanent home is in Savyon. The Sharonys have three daughters, one of whom has just joined the army.

Less than a month after assuming his post, Sharony sat down with The CJN's David Lazarus in Montreal to discuss the future of Israel Bonds under his leadership.

CJN: You spoke today to a group of rabbis about the future of Bonds. What was your message to them?

Sharony: The message was composed of a few components. The first one is due to some articles in the press and some quotations that came out of Jerusalem as to Israel not needing the money being raised in the Diaspora ...

I wanted them to realize the fallacy in trying to take it [that] way because the vehicle that is called Israel Bonds is of the highest importance to the government of Israel — especially at a time of [Israeli] economic growth, when reserves of hard currency are at the largest amount ever, [when] exports are growing tremendously, [when] the GDP [Gross Domestic Product] per capita is growing, [when] jobs are being created. In spite of all that, the need [for Bonds] exists, and for a very simple reason: it is especially [needed] at a time of growth, when the resources needed to support growth are higher.

It's when you go up the hill that you need the after-burner to push you forward with more energy.

We have to provide the infrastructure that can support growth of five to six per cent annually. We have to provide an infrastructure that can support the establishment of new industrial facilities anywhere in the country. And that [includes] energy and telecommunication in their widest range of capabilities. It [also includes] a road network and a railroad network, and improving our civilan airfields and air transportation.

All that calls for money. Israel puts $3 billion a year into infrastructure, which is way beyond what it used to put previously, and it has to double it in order to really meet the rate of growth and the absorption of newcomers.

CJN: You're filling some big shoes as successor to Meir Rosenne. What personal stamp do you see yourself putting on Bonds under your leadership?

Sharony: I'm not trying to go into anybody's shoes. I'm coming from not only the military community, but from the industrial and private business sector.

I spent close to nine years in the industrial private sector as a vice-president of a big corporation and as a president of a smaller corporation, so I'm talking with the insight of what takes place in Israel in the high tech and non-high tech industrial community.

I spent some years being the economic minister for the State of Israel [Investment Authority] to North America in New York, which gave me some understanding of interfacing with the business community in North America.

I also came recently from being the director-general of the Ministry of Industry and Trade, which gave me a real insight into the business sector, trade and industry in Israel.

CJN: How concretely will you be using those linkages in your capacity as Bonds' world leader?

Sharony: I see it very simply. First, I'm delivering a message which includes economic growth and an understanding of the economy of the State of Israel, which I think is very important because Bonds is an investment in Israel.

Secondly, I'll call upon my [former business] colleagues [to network] with the business community in Israel. I think this is another avenue, another added value to the Bonds organization, to network beautifully into the communities — Jewish and non-Jewish — in the United States and Canada.

The third thing, which I think is to an extent a deviation from previous trends, is to introduce Bonds as an instrument for creating a bond between more Jewish people and the State of Israel.

CJN: You feel there has been a decline in the number of Jews "bonding" with Bonds?

Sharony: Yes, [and I feel it is attributable to the] perception of Bonds' role as an organization.

At some time, the organization probably felt the need to go to the financial institutions on account of the Jewish community and raise the higher sums of money, which is easier to raise [there].

[But] I think that our role in the life of the Jewish people — and that's why in some cases the government of Israel is willing to pay a higher premium — is to get close to as many Jews as we can. To [meet] the needs of the hundreds of thousands of people instead of the tens of thousands.

CJN: What personal qualities or skills do you bring to your job?

Sharony: I've been working with people since I was 18. I haven't worked with slogans or with small, tiny groups. I've worked with people and I've worked with a lot of people. So this is something I bring as an asset.

Another one is managing. I think this organization has to have management to really cope with its mission. Third, [I bring] an insight into the economy of the state of Israel — first-hand insight — which I think is also an asset.

CJN: During Mr. Rosenne's tenure, 15 Bonds offices were shut down as part of a process of streamlining. Will this continue?

Sharony: No. [Instead, we'll be] optimizing resources and maybe even opening a new office or two. If I want to reach more Jews I have to be present at more places.

CJN: Are you suggesting it may not have been in Bonds' interest to close the offices?

Sharony: Everything has to be judged on the merits of when it happened. You're asking me at the time, was it the right thing to do? I don't know. I wasn't there.

My intentions today are to reach as many more Jews as I can. If this calls for optimization of existing resources on account of A, B and C within the organization, to be present at more places, I'll do it. If it calls for opening or reopening offices, I can tell you that in 1994 I will open one office.

The message has to get out: We want to reach more Jews. It's not only a slogan. It has to be presented on the ground. People have to see that something is being done, even as a token indication.

CJN: Have you yet set up a specific agenda for Bonds as you begin to direct its course?

Sharony: No. I've established only goals and targets that I want to be achieved. To set an agenda I have to be more familiar, more acquainted, have more insight into the organization. One thing I do know: I will meet the goal we have set of selling to investors in Israel.

The other thing is the number of Jews we want to reach. We want 25 per cent more purchasers than last year. I'm talking about $1 billion, but with 25 per cent more purchasers.

CJN: Bonds raised slightly less in 1993 than in 1992. Was this the result of a specific strategy by the government of Israel to put a cap on the amount sold?

Sharony: No, that wasn't the reason. There were quite a few reasons. The 7½ per cent variable rate instrument disappeared. The other reasons are not known to me. I didn't analyze it.

What I have seen is that we went down in the United States in transactions. We went down in transactions, which means we went down in purchases. I want to [develop] a higher number of purchasers. It's important. If we can provide another kind of glue that binds Jewish people together with the state of Israel, I will do that. I see that as a major role of the organization.

CJN: You speak of the $1-billion goal for 1994. But by increasing the number of purchasers by 25 per cent, would that not mean having less from the "big givers"?

Sharony: Arithmetically, you are right.

CJN: Why not continue the amount of big givers, plus increase the number of purchasers?

Sharony: I would like to, but I want you to realize I have a given amount of effort, of energy, to radiate to that many people and that many offices and that much of a budget.

Assuming you can always stretch a little more, if you want to increase the number of purchasers by 25 per cent, then it's going to be on account of something. It couldn't be out of the blue sky.

We will be in the range of what we raised last year. But I want to have 25 per cent more purchasers, which means the "big buyers" will stay.

No matter how many more we're going to get, we'll still have to be dependent on the big sales. How to optimize our stretch, the additional stretch of doing more — this is the target of the organization in 1994.

CJN: How big a problem is the plan by some American Orthodox rabbis to boycott Israel Bonds?

Sharony: I don't think it is a big problem.

I'll tell you what bothers me. In Israel we are trying to reach peace. Even the opposition — that talks the way it talks [against the peace plan] — would like to get peace. [It may be] on their terms, but peace is not an issue that you argue about.

The total responsibility [of this issue] lies on the shoulders of the government of Israel. [You can't] sit anywhere else in the Diaspora and boycott the efforts of the government of Israel. There have been congregations that had in a difference of opinion with previous governments, but they didn't boycott them. I think we have to support one another. Boycotting is the wrong way.

CJN: But if one way you hope to reach more Jews is through the synagogues, a boycott by some rabbis will make your job all the tougher.

Sharony: Yes, of course.

CJN: Was this issue one of the reasons you met here in Montreal with local rabbis?

Sharony: No. I wanted to start a Pesach campaign. I don't want to wait for the High Holy Days, but to start a campaign now. If we want to reach more Jews, if we want to talk to more people, we want to start it now. It's an on-going campaign. If you want to reach more people, and the resources you have are limited, then time is of the essence.

The other reason for the meeting was wanting to answer some questions being raised.

For example, there are some people who say they don't want to give money to any organization that provides money to the Palestinians. But Israel gave a token sum of $25 million, out of $2 billion committed. We didn't give it yet. We committed ourselves to give, like any other country.

At the same time it is only a token amount that provides an entry ticket into the braintrust that deals internationally — together with the World Bank — with the regional projects. If you take it from this perspective, you understand exactly what has been done. If you want to use it as a flag irrespective of anything else, there's no way I can convince you. You'll do whatever you want to do. I'm trying to give you the picture in numbers, intentions, why it has been done, and what the benefit of doing so is.

Sharony: Notes are being sold at 5¼ per cent, unless it's a $5-million note, which takes 5½ per cent floating. The Economic Development Issue sells for six per cent, flat.

CJN: Locally, at least, federation and Bonds have been rivals in their campaigns. Do you see the Pesach campaign as increasing that rivalry?

Sharony: I'm not going to fight with the federations. That's not my intention. My intention is to start a Pesach campaign in the synagogues and to reach as many Jews as I can in Canada and the United States.

CJN: At $100 million, Canada comprised about 10 per cent of Bonds sales last year. Do you see Canada with a special role to play?

Sharony: Yes, because it set an example last year of having more purchasers and more items. It has gone up in numbers and in numbers of purchasers. This is very important because it shows that the potential [for increasing purchases on a world-wide scale] does exist.

Palestinians, Jews rally to support peace process

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — In a show of solidarity, throngs of Jews and Palestinians from Israel and the territories rallied last Saturday night in a show of support for the peace process and to denounce the murders of 30 Palestinian worshipers in Hebron.

Sponsored by Peace Now, the rally attracted an estimated 10,000 Jews, Christians, Muslims and Druze, many of whom had traveled by the busload to attend the demonstration.

Placards proclaiming "Dismantle the Settlements" and "There is a Mandate for Peace" were held aloft during the demonstration.

Following a moment of silence in memory of the murdered Palestinians, peace activists such as Dr. Ahmed Tibi, an Israeli Arab confidant of PLO chairman Yasser Arafat, and Chanah Meron, an Israeli entertainer who lost her leg in a terrorist attack, spoke in favor of the peace accord and called for an end to violence by both Jews and Palestinians.

Across the street, several hundred right-wing demonstrators burned a Palestinian flag and brandished placards depicting Arafat leading Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin by the nose.

A large police contingent equipped with riot gear formed a human barrier between the two groups of demonstrators, preventing clashes.

For the most part, a feeling of good will prevailed at the rally. Palestinians and Jews mingled before and after the speeches, and it was clear that many had come to the rally together.

"We're here to support the government," said Baruch Shifman, who attended the demonstration with his wife and 13-year-old daughter. "The country is undergoing a difficult period, and we have to show our support and solidarity."

Like many demonstrators, Shifman's wife, Judy, called on the government to remove all Jewish settlers from Hebron, where on Feb. 25 Dr. Baruch Goldstein, an American-born resident of Kiryat Arba, gunned down 30 Palestinians praying at the Tomb of the Patriarchs, a place holy to Jews, Muslims and Christians.

"It's about time we stopped fascist activities by right-wing settlers in the territories, especially in Hebron," Judy Shifman said. "The government must stop them from bullying Arabs in their homes."

Asked whether she is in favor of removing all Jewish settlements in the territories, Shifman shrugged her shoulders and said: "I'm not certain. I think that most settlers should leave, but we must let the peace process decide this question."

"After what happened in Hebron, I felt I had to do something to show the government how upset I am," said Gagu Eshet, an 18-year-old soldier from Tel Aviv.

Attending the rally with her friends, Eshet, wearing jeans and a Peace Now T-shirt, said: "We want to change the situation in the territories. People need to know that not all Israelis behave like that psychopath in Hebron."

Of her army service, she said, "When I served in Jerusalem, I felt very uncomfortable, as if I was some kind of conqueror. I've always wanted peace, but the feeling has become even stronger since I became a soldier.

"We will have peace," she added. "I wouldn't be here if I didn't believe that."

Hanna Khoury, a Christian Arab from Jerusalem, said he was "very happy to see so many people working toward peace."

Holding a sign declaring "Peace Is the Way" in Hebrew, English and Arabic, he said, "Peace is going to happen, despite what happened in Hebron. Revenge, by Arabs or Jews, won't solve anything."

According to Khoury, "The majority of the Palestinians support the peace accord. It's a small majority, maybe 55 percent, but I'm convinced that most Palestinians desire peace."

While he conceded that the Hebron incident has hurt the peace talks, he said, "If the Israeli army begins to withdraw from the territories, I think the momentum will increase."

Ali Mosbah, a Muslim from Hebron, agreed that the Palestinian people back the peace plan, despite the murders at his local mosque.

"The people of Hebron aren't opposed to the peace process, although they are overwhelmed by grief," he said.

"There is no word to describe the despair we are feeling right now. Still, we want peace instead of terror. We want to be able to live in our homes and sleep soundly at night, knowing that no one will attack us," he said. "Parents make their children stay indoors after dark, fearing that settlers will attack them."

Pausing to gaze at the rally, Mosbah said, "There are too many Baruch Goldsteins, but not all Jews are the same. This rally is proof of that. I have Jewish friends. I'm not saying I can't live with Jews — just not religious ones."

Referring to the army's closure of the territories since the murders, which prohibits Palestinians from the West Bank and Gaza Strip from entering Israel proper, Mosbah said, "I'm a student in Jerusalem and therefore have a Jerusalem identity card. Without that card, I could not be at this rally. Believe me, thousands more Palestinians would have attended this rally if they could have."

Hamzeh, a 23-year-old Muslim from eastern Jerusalem, admitted that "there are many people who would like to see the peace process die. I believe this is our only chance for peace, and we can't afford to lose it. I honestly think we won't get another opportunity."

Israel releases Arab prisoners

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — Amid continuing hopes that the move will ease tensions following the killings of 30 Palestinians at a mosque in Hebron, Israel last week released a second group of Palestinians held in Israeli jails.

The prisoner release — last week's second and the fourth since Israel and the PLO signed the self-rule accord last September — involved some 400 prisoners, bringing the total of those freed last week to nearly 1,000.

The earlier prisoner release was not applauded by PLO leaders, who said the move offered too little and too late after the killings in Hebron.

But Israel Defence Force and police officials were nonetheless hoping that the second prisoner release would contribute to a calmer atmosphere in the territories, which have witnessed violent confrontations between Palestinians and the IDF for most of last week.

The second release of prisoners coincided with the publishing of a report by the leading Israeli human rights group, B'Tselem, that harshly criticized the IDF's handling of the past week's unrest in the territories.

B'Tselem called on the army to stop pouring reinforcements into the territories at a time when emotions already were at fever pitch.

The group also called on the IDF to lift its curfews and closures of the West Bank and Gaza, steps it said could only further heighten tensions.

A spokesman said the group had studied 12 cases in which Palestinians had been killed by Israeli troops, and the group found that in not one of the cases had the lives of Israeli soldiers been threatened.

Israeli troops have longstanding orders not to shoot unless their lives are in danger.

B'Tselem further urged the IDF not to send poorly trained troops into the territories, particularly those who were not fully aware of crowd-dispersal methods that do not involve lethal force.

Last Thursday, the official commission established earlier in the week to investigate the killings in Hebron invited Israelis and Palestinians to provide any information that might prove useful for the inquiry.

The commission published advertisements in the Palestinian daily newspaper Al-Nahar and in Israeli newspapers saying: "Anyone who wishes to give evidence, or submit a document or exhibit to the committee should apply in writing, giving an outline of the evidence he wishes to give, or of the text of the document, or a description of the exhibit."

The committee gave a March 23 deadline for those wanting to respond.

Israel previously set up a commission of inquiry following the 1982 massacre of hundreds of Lebanese in the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps outside of Beirut by Lebanese militias allied with Israel.

A similar commission was established to investigate the killing of 18 Palestinians by Israeli police at Jerusalem's Al-Aksa mosque in 1990.

Jordanian officials cool to Schindler's List

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Jordan may not allow cinemas to screen the film Schindler's List because of the tense atmosphere following the Hebron massacre, officials in Amman said last week.

The film premiered here last Thursday evening. The gala premiere, at Tel Aviv's Shahaf Cinema, was held under the auspices of Yad Vashem and the Hebrew University, whose Holocaust research will benefit from the proceeds.

President Ezer Weizman, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, Knesset Speaker Shevah Weiss and Chief of General Staff Lt.-Gen. Ehud Barak all attended, as did the film's director, Steven Spielberg.

"But if it is totally designed to show sympathy to the Jews, we will not allow it in because of the current situation after the Hebron massacre," he added. "How can we expect our people to show sympathy to the Jews if the Jews are not showing any sympathy to the Arabs?"

About two dozen Israeli Holocaust survivors sat in a Tel Aviv cinema last Tuesday to watch a special, emotionally-charged screening of Schindler's List.

"The movie is done well and is authentic, but for one like me who lived through it, it is nothing like what really occurred," said Hana Rojansky.

"The move is too rosy in comparison to what actually happened," she added. "Apparently [Spielberg] didn't want to horrify too much."

"As a movie it is genius, but as history..." survivor Yosef Bau said, shaking his head.

Bau's marriage to his wife Rivka is depicted in the movie and they both appear on the film's list of Jews moved to Schindler's special camp for factory workers outside Auschwitz. In reality, Rivka never worked for Schindler.

Bau laughs off the couple's marriage scene in the film as overplayed, portraying a group standing around the couple, who are being blessed under the chuppah. The real wedding had no trappings or guests, he said.

The Hebrew University senate, meanwhile, has decided to confer an honorary doctoral degree on Spielberg.

Screening committee

Jordan has allowed the showing of other anti-Nazi films and has not banned any of Spielberg's previous movies.

"Until now, we have not received any request from any movie house to stage [Schindler's List] here," a member of the committee that authorizes the screening of new films in Jordan told the Reuters news agency.

Brussels police block rioters from synagogue

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BRUSSELS — A pro-Palestinian rally organized by North-African immigrants in the center of Brussels last week turned into a serious riot, with a synagogue among the rioters' targets.

Also targeted by the rioters, who destroyed property and clashed with police on Sunday evening, was the hotel where Nazi-hunter Simon Wiesenthal was guest of honor at a reception for the premiere here of Schindler's List.

The rally, which had not been permitted by the city's authorities, was organized by two local groups, the Anti-Imperialist League and the General Union of Students of Palestine. It was staged to protest the Feb. 25 massacre of 39 Muslims at a Hebron mosque by Dr. Baruch Goldstein.

At least 250 people took part in the rally, which turned sour after a few dozen masked youths mingled with the crowd.

Police forces in riot gear rushed to the area to try to restore order when serious disturbances broke out. The demonstrators hurled stones and bottles at police, damaged dozens of cars, including police vehicles, and smashed shop windows in Brussels' main shopping area.

"They were some 100 to 150 very young rioters who used this occasion to cause trouble," Brussels Police Commissioner Pierre Van Doorselaer said later.

Some of the rioters tried to march to a synagogue but were stopped by police. Others targeted the Metropole Hotel, on Brussels' main boulevard, where Wiesenthal was attending the reception for Schindler's List.

Wiesenthal and the other guests at the reception had to be protected by police when the protestors crossed the boulevard toward the hotel.

Seven rioters were arrested, police officials said, adding that no one was injured during the clashes.

Later that night, police set up heightened security around Jewish schools, synagogues and Israeli diplomatic buildings in the Belgian capital.

Sharansky criticizes absorption efforts

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Former refusenik Natan Sharansky firmly believes that the aliyah of a half-million immigrants from the former Soviet Union since 1989 constituted an unprecedented historic challenge — one the Israeli government failed to meet.

Charging that Israel allowed the unique opportunities presented by the mass migration of Soviet Jewry to slip away, Sharansky stated that another million Jews in the former Soviet Union might make aliyah if they got the encouragement they need.

But the Israeli government has not understood the significance of events, he said, and has instead adopted a "business as usual" approach rather than offering a comprehensive vision for the absorption of the olim.

Sharansky made the comments during an interview with the Jewish Telegraphic Agency at the Zionist Forum, an advocacy organization he heads for immigrants from the former Soviet Union.

He cited the current political and economic instability in the former Soviet Union as presenting Israel with a "window of opportunity" of historic proportions for absorbing more Russian immigrants.

But the instability is not in itself sufficient cause to lead to more waves of immigration from the former Soviet Union, he said.

"After all," Sharansky noted wryly, Jews "know how to survive. Even if today is worse than yesterday, (they) can imagine it could be worse tomorrow.

"While at the same (time) that we keep having the desire and the dream of 'next year in Jerusalem,' we feel that life is full if it is a life among other people in the Diaspora. We feel very comfortable (there)," he said.

Thus, in spite of all the instability, the Jews of the former Soviet Union need some kind of incentive to come to Israel, Sharansky said.

Because of the reports prospective emigrants get from their families or friends already in Israel, "each day they're comparing why they should leave and why they should stay," he said.

"That's why, in this unstable situation, when the arguments for and against (emigrating) have almost the same weight, one little argument from here (Israel), one more encouragement from here, can change everything," said Sharansky.

He noted that potential immigrants' biggest fears and uncertainties, based on the information they get, are whether they will be able to work in their professions and whether their children will integrate happily into the Israeli school system.

For Sharansky, the core problem is the Israeli government's concept of absorption, although he does not blame Absorption Minister Yair Tsaban.

The activist said Tsaban has little power to fight Finance Minister Avraham Shohat and Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, who have maintained that successful absorption of the olim will occur as a natural byproduct of a healthy Israeli economy.

"That's what's good for a normal country," and would be appropriate for the absorption of 30,000 to 40,000 immigrants annually in Israel, according to Sharansky.

But "it's not good for a unique historical situation when (there was a) 10 percent increase in population in the space of three years," he said. "And it's not good for a Zionist state which has the aim of encouraging people to come as quickly as possible."

And it certainly will not succeed in drawing a significant percentage of the Jewish population of the former Soviet Union to Israel, he maintained, noting that the Israeli government has to develop a plan to encourage more people to come.

The plan, he said, should focus on their specific concerns about jobs and schools and should recognize the unprecedented nature of this aliyah.

"After all, why are they making aliyah? Because of their children.

"But our leadership is not even thinking in these terms," he said. Instead, "the government (absolved) itself (of) the responsibility to think about how to solve the problem (in the belief) that it would take care of itself.

" 'We will give them some money and they will take care of themselves,' " is how he described the official attitude of the Israeli government to the situation.

Sharansky said he was told by top officials as early as 1988 not to be concerned because the immigrants would be absorbed the way they were absorbed in the 1930s, 1940s and 1950s.

But the old models do not apply, he said.

At the heart of the matter, he stated, is the challenge to the "orthodox, fundamental concept of the Jewish state" that this aliyah poses.

"After all," he said, "the idea with which the Jewish state was (founded) is that it was like a melting pot where a new type of Jew is born" after shedding his characteristics and identity from the Diaspora.

It meant that those who came here had to become Israelis as quickly as possible.

While this may have been appropriate at the beginning of statehood, said Sharansky, it no longer applies.

"Thank G-d, we already exist and we are a nation which justifies its existence correctly as a continuation of the Jewish people," he said.

He noted that there is no longer "an absorption of Diaspora Jews by Israel, but a kind of synthesis, a mutual change of all of the Jewish world."

There is no doubt that the Jews from the former Soviet Union have to change, and they are changing, said Sharansky.

But, he said, Israeli society, whether it wants to or not, is also changing, and officials are resisting that change.

"That's why (officials) say, 'In the '50s it was like this, why should it be different now?' " he said.

But this aliyah is different, according to Sharansky, who said that it is not Zionist in nature.

Olim from the former Soviet Union are professionally strong and very ambitious, and Israelis, whether working in universities, hospitals, hotels or gas stations, feel the competition, he said.

"So the aliyah becomes threatening and is hard for (Israeli) society to accept," he said.

Sometimes "it is difficult not to despair," he said. "But I hope that Am Yisrael, the Jews of the world, have much more inner power than their leaders (believe) they do."

Damascus school, synagogue close

Those with the visas are trying to get seats on regularly scheduled flights from Damascus. Just 24 Jews were on last Sunday night's flight, she noted.

Carr said the synagogue and Hebrew school in Damascus have closed and Jews leaving the country are not permitted to sell their homes or businesses.

Over 2,600 Jews left Syria between April and October of 1992, when the country relaxed travel restrictions. The policy was abruptly halted for no stated reason.

American Jewish groups called on the Clinton administration to ask the Syrian government to prevent any of the violent threats from being carried out.

State Department spokesman Mike McCurry said that while the department had not yet seen the actual leaflet, it had read a translation "which has clearly got a great deal of inflammatory and despicable language" in it.

A department source said that, according to U.S. Embassy officials in Syria, the Syrian government is aware of the pamphlet and has taken "appropriate actions."

Ukraine, U.S. sign agreement

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — The United States and Ukraine have signed an agreement designed to protect historic Jewish cemeteries and synagogues in the former Soviet republic.

The agreement, inked during a visit here last week by Ukrainian President Leonid Kravchuk, was a follow-up to a series of such promises Kravchuk made to Jewish groups since Ukraine became an independent state.

U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher and Ukrainian Foreign Minister Anatoliy Zlenko signed the accord, which also seeks to preserve other historic sites in Ukraine.

Rabbi Arthur Schneier of New York, who is chairman of the U.S. Commission for the Preservation of America's Heritage Abroad, hailed the agreement, on which he had worked for nearly two years with Ukrainian officials.

Rabbi Schneier, who is also founder of the Appeal of Conscience Foundation, an ecumenical group promoting religious freedoms, was host to Kravchuk in his Manhattan synagogue when the Ukrainian leader made his original promise to American Jewish leaders that Jewish life would be protected and encouraged in Ukraine.

Ukraine was historically a centre of Jewish religion and culture, but there were also strained relations between many Ukrainians and Jews.

The two countries also agreed to cooperate on drawing up lists of historic places, including houses of worship, monuments and cemeteries. The commission headed by Rabbi Schneier was named as the U.S. executor of the accord.

Police said security has been increased at Jewish schools and synagogues and 500 officers were dispatched to Crown Heights in the immediate aftermath of the attack.

The mayor's office established a hotline for information connected to the case and offered a $30,000 reward.

Halberstam, who was known to his classmates at the Oholei Torah Yeshivah as "Ari," was said to be a favorite of the Lubavitcher rebbe. A classmate described him as a quiet, athletic boy who was very involved in the Lubavitch movement's Jewish outreach programs. His father, Chesed, was a butler and aid to the rebbe's late wife, Chaya Moussia.

A spokesman for the Lubavitch community said President Bill Clinton had telephoned the Halberstam family to express his grief over the incident and to promise to pursue justice with vigor.

The News in Brief

Bomb Hurled at Rabbi's House

OXFORD — A petrol bomb was hurled late last month at the home of Rabbi Shmuel Boteach, director of Oxford University's L'Chaim House and Chabad House of Oxford, the university's on-campus group for Jewish students. The bomb crashed into a second-storey window, just a few feet from where the rabbi's infant son slept in a crib. The fire was soon put out and no one was hurt. There is speculation that the attack was connected to the Hebron massacre. With 1,500 student members, the L'Chaim Society is Oxford's second largest student organization. Rabbi Boteach denounced the attack as "cowardly" and said it was intended to cause personal injury.

Prosecutions May 'Die'

LONDON — Britain's home office minister has told the House of Lords that the country's War Crimes Act will, in all probability, die "a natural death" if no prosecutions can be initiated against alleged former Nazis living in Britain

Earl Ferrers made the assessment after a former Conservative minister, Lord Boyd-Carpenter, suggested that the expenditure to date of the equivalent of about $8 million on war crimes investigations without any resulting prosecutions showed "what a nonsense the whole operation had been."

Ferrers said 27 cases of alleged Nazis are still being investigated.

But, he added, "when the police have carried out their investigations and found there is nothing further to be investigated, it will die a natural death."

Iran Executes Jewish 'Spy'

JERUSALEM — Iran executed a 78-year-old Iranian Jew as a spy for "Zionism" just hours after the Hebron massacre, Israel Television reported last week.

Fisulam Mechubad, jailed for two years, was executed at a prison in northern Teheran shortly after the massacre, the reports said.

Mechubad was buried in a Jewish cemetery in the presence of his wife and a handful of relatives, it added.

Iran had not publicized the execution and had forbidden the family to mention it publicly. The report said news of the execution reached Israel last Wednesday, but did not say how.

Radio Shack Pulls Game

NEW YORK — Radio Shack has cancelled all future orders for an electronic pinball game that displays a swastika. The company also issued an apology to anyone who might have been offended by the game.

The U.S.-based Anti-Defamation League, which had notified the company of the problem, praised Radio Shack for its prompt action.

The swastika is one of several images, including a tree, a tank and a telephone, to appear in the "Pinball Master" game, as a player advances from one round to the next.

Decision Lets Demjanjuk Stay

WASHINGTON — A federal appeals court in Cincinnati last month refused to reconsider a previous ruling allowing John Demjanjuk to remain in the United States. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the sixth Circuit let stand its decision overturning Demjanjuk's extradition.

The Justice Department may appeal the decision to the Supreme Court within 90 days

The Cincinnati appellate court's decision reaffirms a ruling made in November, when a three-judge panel of the appellate court invalidated a 1985 order calling for Demjanjuk to be extradited to Israel.

Muslim Driver In Israel

TEL AVIV — The Serbian Muslim driver for the Jewish community in Sarajevo has been allowed to emigrate with his family to Israel.

Jewish Agency officials said that Rasheed Hoznic, 45, arrived in Israel with his family over last weekend.

When hostilities broke out in Sarajevo, Hoznic, along with his wife, Zorica, and their sons, Zlatan, 16, and Goran, 13, decided to throw in their lot with the Jewish community.

Hoznic began helping out at Sarajevo's Jewish Community Center. Confronted by sniper fire, he would nonetheless drive around the city on missions for the Jewish community.

His "salary" was a plate of soup each day.

Zorica and their children fled to Belgrade, where they began undergoing conversion to Judaism.

When a bus convoy left Sarajevo four weeks ago with Jewish and non-Jewish refugees from the besieged city, Hoznic was allowed out to be reunited with his family.

Together with those Jews who decided to make aliyah, he traveled to Budapest. But there disappointment awaited him: his family had not yet arrived, and because he was not Jewish, Hoznic was not eligible to enter Israel under the Law of Return.

But his wife and sons soon made their way to Budapest. Because they had already converted, he was eligible to join them for the trip to Israel.

Satmarers, Parents Fight Over Boy

NEW YORK — An Israeli teenager, allegedly kidnapped two years ago by a Brooklyn Satmar rabbi, has retained a lawyer who claims the boy wants to stay with the Hassidic community that took him in.

A civil case to determine the boy's custody and a criminal case charging a Satmar rabbi and his wife with kidnapping, both started last week.

Shai Fhima, 15, who disappeared in April 1992 on his way to bar mitzvah lessons in Brooklyn, surfaced early last week in Rockland County, an hour north of here.

Shai's father, Michael Reuven, who lives in Israel, and the boy's mother, Hana Fhima of New Jersey, are both battling Rabbi Aryeh Zaks for the boy's custody. The boy's parents, who are divorced, are secular.

The boy's lawyer claims that Shai wants to stay with Rabbi Zaks and does not want to return to his mother. Hana Fhima has alleged that Shai was "brainwashed" by the Borough Park Satmar yeshiva she sent him to for studies two years ago, and claims her son was abducted.

Shai's whereabouts during the past 22 months are still unknown. He is a ward of the family court and will be placed in a foster home until guardianship is determined.

Meanwhile, jury selection began last week in Brooklyn State Supreme Court in the trial of Rabbi Shlomo and Malka Helbrans, the Satmar couple charged with conspiracy and kidnapping in the Shai Fhima case. Rabbi Helbrans was the boy's bar mitzvah teacher.

Heeeere's Louis...

LOS ANGELES — Despite opposition from Jewish and other groups, Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan appeared on the syndicated Arsenio Hall Show late last month, and repeated his well-worn charges that Jews had controlled the African slave trade, while rejecting his label as a "black Hitler."

Farrakhan, known for anti-Semitic ravings, shelved most of his histrionics in favor of a modulated delivery heard over some 160 TV stations across North America.

His appearance on the show had been opposed by the Anti-Defamation League and the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, gay groups and even numerous black viewers — including actress Whoopi Goldberg — as a clearly nervous Hall acknowledged.

Serbs Doubt Tudjman Apology

TORONTO — Members of Metro Toronto's Serbian community say they doubt the sincerity of Croatia president Franjo Tudjman, who has apologized for his book questioning the Holocaust. Tudjman recently sent a letter to B'nai Brith officials in Washington, D.C., saying he would purge offensive passages from the forthcoming English edition of Wastelands of Historical Reality, which expresses doubt about the number of Jews killed in the Holocaust. Serbs regard Tudjman's statement to BB as "mere tokenism," according to a recent edition of Voice of Canadian Serbs, a weekly newspaper. "No Serbian organization has received an apology from [Tudjman] for the book's contents. The genocide in Croatia [during World War II] was directed at Serbs and Jews alike."

Charities Headed for 'Crisis'

TORONTO — Canadian charities are headed for financial crisis due to government cutbacks and slower increases in private donations, according to a report released here last week by the Canadian Centre for Philanthropy.

The report said even if private donations double over the next five years, they likely would not be enough to offset government cuts.

Registered charities in Canada last year received $49 billion from various levels of government; $8.2 billion from private donors and $1.2 billion from corporations.

Congress calls for 'heightened awareness'

CJC Calls for Awareness

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) advises that Canada's Jewish community should be in "a heightened state of awareness" and more security-conscious in the wake of threats of reprisals over the Hebron massacre and the attack last week on Lubavitch chassidim in New York.

CJC has struck a "security consultative committee" composed of about six lay and professional leaders, ready to help any region of the country with security.

There's no need for alarm, just to be more aware, suggests Bernie Farber, national director of community relations.

Farber calls the Hebron and New York attacks "red flags" for Jewish communities everywhere.

CJC's advice includes maintaining alarm and lighting systems at Jewish institutions in top working order, being aware of suspicious parcels, vehicles or persons, and having either volunteers or professionals act as security at communal functions.

Congress has been in touch with police forces at all levels to ensure Jewish community facilities are being watched.

CJC also has a booklet outlining security precautions. They are available from all CJC regional offices.

Knesset, Rabin on Massacre

JERUSALEM — The Knesset has expressed "profound shock" and condemned "the criminal and revolting murder" in Hebron last month by Dr. Baruch Goldstein. The resolution, adopted Feb. 28, said the Knesset "shares the grief of the families who have lost those dear to them." Israel's parliament expressed its "disgust and rejects the expressions of solidarity and sympathy voiced by a few extremists for the murderous acts which occurred in Hebron. The Knesset disassociates itself from any generalization or sweeping accusation against broad segments of the public, including the settlers." The resolution passed 93 to one, with seven absentions.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, speaking in a solemn and quiet tone, said, "As a Jew and an Israeli, as a man and a human being, I am humiliated by the shame brought upon us by the lowly killer."

Peres on Supporters

JERUSALEM — Foreign Minister Shimon Peres last week described Kiryat Arba as a "breeding ground for murder," and accused those who supported Baruch Goldstein's act of mass murder as "enemies of the people."

In a strongly worded address to the Labor Party, Peres said he was just as shocked by the expressions of "joy and exultation" coming from those who agreed with Goldstein's act as he was with the act itself.

"We must take away their weapons and get them out of Judea and Samaria," said Peres. "Look what [harm] one man caused the state of Israel, the nation. We must prevent others from doing the same."

Yesha Rejects Weapons Confiscations

JERUSALEM — The Yesha Council of Jewish Communities in Judea, Samaria and Gaza also expressed its "shock and deep sorrow" at the Hebron massacre. But the council "rejects out of hand the proposals by irresponsible politicians, with well-known political agendas, to confiscate the weapons of Jews living in Yesha and to punish Israeli citizens without a trial." Yesha also said it is considering ending co-operation with Kach. Some Kach activists have been involved in the council and its activities in the past.

Peace Now Sends Message

TORONTO — The Canadian Friends of Peace Now "share the communal outrage at the brutal and senseless killings in Hebron," according to a letter to Itzhak Shelef, Israel's Ambassador to Canada, from Mel Shipman, the Canadian Friends' president. "We grieve with the families of the innocent victims and stretch out a hand of friendship to the Palestinian people ... It is clear that the resumption of meaningful negotiations between Israel and the PLO can only occur if the armed and extremist elements among the settlers are neutralized." The Friends say they support the call from Peace Now in Israel for the removal of settlers from the Hebron area.

NIF Slams Attack

TORONTO — The New Israel Fund, which provides financial and technical assistance to a variety of organizations working toward Arab-Jewish co-existence in Israel, also condemned the Hebron massacre. The fund called the shootings "monstrous and reprehensible. We cannot let this stop our efforts to heal animosities between Arabs and Jews and work toward a society that is pluralistic, tolerant and just," said Norman Rosenberg, the fund's Washington-based executive director. "Perhaps this senseless and loathsome act will actually serve to expedite peace and bolster democratic values in Israel."

Commission Members

JERUSALEM — Israel's Supreme Court President Justice Meir Shamgar last week appointed the following members to the commission of inquiry investigating the Hebron massacre: Shamgar himself; Supreme Court Justice Eliezer Goldberg; Nazareth District Court Judge Abdel Rahman Zu'bi; Open University President Menahem Ya'ari; and former chief of General Staff Lt.-Gen.(Res.) Moshe Levy. The commission is scheduled to hold its first meeting this week.

Israelis Polled

JERUSALEM — While a vast majority of Israelis condemn the massacre in Hebron, a poll conducted last week found that 10.8 per cent of the population refused to do so, saying "it must be understood against the background of Arab terror against Jews."

The poll of 500 adults, conducted for the International Centre for Peace in the Middle East, also found that 3.6 per cent of the population praised Dr. Baruch Goldstein for his act, 51.7 per cent strongly condemned him, 27.1 per cent condemned him, and 6.8 per cent had no opinion.

Call For Ban

JERUSALEM — Absorption Minister Yair Tsaban last week recommended that American Jews who are active in the Jewish Defence League, Kach and Kahane Chai should not be allowed to immigrate to Israel.

"The only proper way to do so is to declare that these organizations are illegal and to state that anyone who is associated with them cannot enter Israeli borders," Tsaban said.

But the Association for Civil Rights in Israel said it was impossible to ban all members of an organization collectively from entering Israel, even if the group is outlawed in Israel.

Under the Law of Return, the ACRI said, persons who endanger state safety, have a criminal record, or are likely to endanger public safety or work against the Jewish people, can be prevented from entering the country. "But this has to be done on an individual and not a collective basis," the group said.

By RABBI WAYNE ALLEN

If we really want to know about a culture, we ought to look at the books people are reading. Even a cursory examination of any Canadian bookstore would reveal a burgeoning business in self-help books. People want to learn how to diagnose themselves, treat themselves, fulfill themselves spiritually, and relieve themselves emotionally. While I do not dispute the efficaciousness of this genre of literature, I do believe it reveals much about the challenge that Judaism faces.

All the fuss about the self is indicative of our culture that puts the self first. Self-respect, self-assertion, self-help are all important traits. But when people become self-absorbed, life loses its meaning. Judaism stands as a brake to this growing trend, just as Judaism has been counterpoint to other contemporary trends. The Western, liberal tradition in which most of us have been raised stresses individual rights. Judaism, on the other hand, has always stressed individual responsibilities. The Western, liberal tradition insists that we are free to do whatever we want. Judaism insists that we are free to do only what is right and what is good. This may not always be what we want. Contemporary culture emphasizes living for today; the here and now. Judaism counsels us to live for the future. The acquisitions of our society teaches that everyone ought to strive to gain while the altruism of Judaism teaches that we ought to strive to give.

The subliminal message of our society is that we must put ourselves first; that we must fulfill our own needs. Contrast this with the eternal message of Judaism that tells us to always give prominence to the needs of others. It is true that the Mishnah (Sanhedrin 4:5) argues that each individual ought to think that the entire world was created for him or her. But this is intended to be a warning against underestimating the value of others. It is also true that Hillel taught (Avot 1:14) that people cannot expect others to take on their cause when they do not take on that cause themselves. Self-assertiveness and self-respect are important. But Hillel also followed that statement with a warning to those who think only of themselves. Human life would be demeaned and rendered valueless if all we did was think of ourselves. Indeed, self-absorption makes us less than human. It makes us no different than animals who seek only their own gratification.

The challenge that Judaism faces today is to offer an alternative to the self-centredness of popular culture. Judaism needs to convince enough Jews that the most beneficial way of serving themselves is to serve God by serving others.

Agudath Israel will not join commission on intermarriage

Committee consensus 'deluded, futile,' rabbi says

NEW YORK — Agudath Israel of America has announced that it declined an invitation to sit on the newly formed North American Commission on Jewish Identity and Continuity.

Agudah maintains that the commission's hope of reaching a consensus among Orthodox, Conservative and Reform Jews on combating intermarriage is "unrealistic, deluded and futile."

In a letter last fall to Marvin Lender and Shoshana Cardin, chair and vice-chair of the commission, Rabbi Moshe Sherer, president of Agudath Israel, commended the founders of the commission for "recognizing the urgent need" to address the issues of assimilation, ignorance and intermarriage, which are endangering Jewish identity.

However, Rabbi Sherer added that the problems could not be addressed "by pretending that 'virtually every segment of the Jewish community' [as the Commission leaders expressed it], can come together under one banner to develop a common approach."

With the existence of "such a fundamental divergence of perspective" with regard to the cause of the problems, Rabbi Sherer wrote, a meaningful consensus on a solution is impossible.

"I wonder how any of the major Orthodox organizations could go along with the creation of an Orthodox-Conservative-Reform-Reconstructionist-Secular Jewish body to combat [these] plagues," he asked.

While acknowledging that his analysis was pessimistic, Rabbi Sherer claimed that it was also "painfully realistic." He pointed to the fact that approaches such as that recommended by Reform Rabbi Alexander Schindler to proselytize among non-Jews, can be seen as "profoundly anti-halachic," and expressed his own skepticism over the contribution the Reform movement could make in a commission devoted to preventing intermarriage.

Although he recognized that his own views may be considered as extreme, he said he believes that "anything less than classical Judaism cannot and will not stem the hemorrhaging that our people is suffering." As proof he pointed to the success of numerous Orthodox outreach programs.

While concluding that his sitting on the commission would be a fruitless confrontational exercise, Rabbi Sherer thanked Lender and Cardin for their recognition that the view of Agudath Israel's constituency was one to consider.

Agudath Israel's stand was not universally followed by other Orthodox organizations. Representatives of the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations, the Rabbinical Council of America, Yeshiva University, and the Rabbinical Assembly are taking part.

Canadian representatives include Orthodox rabbis Reuven Bulka of Ottawa and Toronto's Mark Dratch; Kurt Rothschild, president of the Canadian Zionist Federation; Prof. Irving Abella, president of Canadian Jewish Congress; and Stanley Plotnick, chair of the Canadian Commission on Jewish Identity and Continuity.

Tolerance of Jewish fanaticism must end

By YESHAYAHU ANUG

After the swift victory of June 1967, the government of the time had a free hand in the newly conquered territories. The occupied Arab population was stunned, passive and submissive. A year later Yigal Allon, the popular Labor leader, became the driving force behind the establishment of Kiryat Arba in the outskirts of the biblical city of Hebron, the site of the 1929 pogrom that had put an end to the centuries old Jewish presence in that town, which is older than Jerusalem. Then in 1977, Menachem Begin authorized the settlement of Jews in the heart of Hebron.

Kiryat Arba and Hebron attracted a very special brand of ultra religious and wildly nationalist settlers from Israel and overseas, and the two outposts became the breeding ground for Jewish fanaticism until then unknown. In time, clashes with the Arab population became almost daily occurences. But as national policy demanded that the right of Jews to live wherever they wanted should rank higher than any other consideration, an ever-growing presence of military units was necessary to secure these Jewish settlers in one of the most hostile Arab environments. That some of these settlements created permanent tension with the local population was inconsequential and never affected their right to be protected, whatever the cost.

The temptation to describe the massacre of Feb. 25 as the insane act of a lonely madman must be resisted, because it was the premeditated crime of a very well-known and determined resident of Kiryat Arba and a devoted follower of Rabbi Meir Kahane. Dr. Bauch Goldstein had repeatedly hinted, also very recently, that he was preparing "something big" to torpedo the ongoing peace process which he regarded as an outrage. The Brooklyn-born physician, father of five, had considered the possibility of dying during the action and has left a revealing farewell letter behind.

The explosion of Arab anger and humiliation in the wake of the monstrous crime was more violent than even the murderer could have hoped for, and its repercussions can still not be fully assessed. The territories erupted in fury and even the hitherto calm Arab community in Israel lost its self-control. Israeli repression was also harsh and added more Arab dead to the long list of the casualties in the mosque.

Yeshayahu Anug

The curfews in the territories have momentarily blocked all attempts at massive revenge, but restrictions will inevitably have to be eased. The international reaction to the massacre was one of enormous dismay and greatly affected Israel's image which has so spectacularly improved recently. The world community, which shared Israel's preocupation with the security of its own citizens, including those who live in the disputed territories and are exposed to daily Arab terrorism, now became aware of the dangers to which the Arab population is exposed at the hands of Jewish terrorists.

The evidence that Jewish terrorism exists and that there are common interests between extremists on both sides is now overwhelming. Both are engaged in sabotaging the peace process. Both represent the same fanatical aims: one group want the whole of their Palestine for the Arabs, and the other the whole of their Eretz Israel for the Jews. Both reject any compromise. Neither has room in "his" land for the other people and both groups are fanatically religious, sure they are carrying out God's will.

Israeli governments of every composition, whether Labor or Likud dominated, have been inexcusably insensitive to the activities of fanatical Jewish extremists who had openly exposed their destructive ideologies and intentions. Arab terrorism got enormous publicity, but there is plenty of evidence, much of it filmed and even televised, of wild rampage, of destruction of Arab property, of shooting of civilians in the area of Hebron and elsewhere, at the hands of the Jewish fanatics. Perpetrators were rarely apprehended and all too often released by a benevolent judiciary. Jewish "underground" members who had murdered or wounded a number of local Arab leaders in the '80s were pardoned by then President Herzog.

While Arab terrorism was fought with all the means of the powerful security machine, Jewish terrorism was treated as a rather lunatic aberration of a few, unlikely to have a major impact. In this atmosphere of official indifference and inexplicable tolerance, the semi-clandestine agenda of the Jewish extremists had no difficulty in prospering. So far, the massacre in the mosque has been its climax. And even now, after the tragic events, the effectiveness of measures announced by the government to prevent known Jewish extremist groups from pursuing their objectives, remains to be proven.

In an effort to avoid disastrous consequences and to save the peace process from collapsing, an opportune reaction came from U.S. President Bill Clinton who swiftly invited all the participants to come to Washington and remain there until agreement is reached. Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and PLO leader Yasser Arafat agreed at once, but then Arafat, under growing pressure by his assistants, withheld his acceptance and posed conditions that are hard to accept.

The peace process is now on hold and may resume — or not — within a month or two. If it does, Israel will find that some of its assets, as envisaged by the Cairo agreement, may have been lost. On the other hand, while Arafat's bargaining position was probably strengthened by the tragedy on the international scene, his clout in the territories was dangerously undermined.

The interruption of the peace process is not the only political result of Dr. Goldstein's crime. He has also irreparably compromised the future of the Jewish presence in the city Hebron and in Kiryat Arba, which will probably become unsustainable. His act has also endangered the entire structure of the Jewish settlements in the territories, which the government had managed to secure in the Oslo agreement with the PLO for the interim period, in the hope of preserving many of them in the the final peace settlement.

But these are only details. Much more than the peace process has been destroyed by Dr. Goldstein's bullets, and a wave of Arab revenge terrorism everywhere must still be expected and be decisively confronted. Two weeks after the massacre in the mosque, any prognosis is premature. On the peace front, the awareness of what is at stake will require intense co-operation between Washington and Jerusalem and the moderate forces of the Arab world. This may work. Meanwhile in Israel, the tolerance for Jewish fanaticism must come to an immediate end, whatever the political cost. Otherwise this country's destiny will be at the mercy of those who, here and overseas, venerate the murderer's memory and example.

Some painful lessons from Hebron

By RABBI REUVEN P. BULKA

The outrage at Hebron was a black day in our lives. Although the act was perpetrated by one person, the knowledge that it was done by "one of us" generated a broad sense of collective responsibility.

This feeling is best summed up in the words of Sephardi Chief Rabbi Eliyahu Bakshi Doron: "To say that I condemn the act is an understatement. I am simply ashamed that a Jew carried out such a villainous and irresponsible act."

We are revulsed at what happened in Hebron, and the reaction of Israel's leaders in the wake of the massacre has been exemplary. Israel's leaders denounced the act in uncompromising terms, sent condolences to the Palestinian people, clamped down on the group involved, set up a commission of inquiry to fully investigate this heinous crime, and is already talking of extending financial aid to the families of the victims.

All this has come forward in less than a week after the incident. I challenge anyone to offer a precedent for anything like this by any government anywhere. Yet for some strange, or perhaps not so strange reason, Israel's reactions are being branded as "Not enough."

There are lessons to be learned from this incident, painful lessons about who we are and where we are going.

Did the attacker represent any religious tradition? According to Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau, "The attacker did not act in the name of the Jewish faith; he had no authority to act in its name. It is a desecration of God's name to connect faith to this incident."

What Chief Rabbi Lau says is true beyond debate. Authentic Judaism vehemently rejects terror, violence, murder, no matter who is the perpetrator. Murder is murder even if committed by a religious Jew.

Not everything that religious Jews do is religious. Religious Jews are capable of sacrilegious behavior. And they are also capable of sacrilegious thinking, including the thinking that justified the Hebron massacre in the mind of the one who carried out this despicable deed.

We must realize that there is sacrilegious thinking and sacrilegious behavior even in religious circles. No, it is not an epidemic. But silence in the face of such reality makes all of us accomplices to the potential horrors.

There is violence in Jewish homes, with husbands thrashing their wives, parents beating their children and even sexually assaulting them.

How tragic it is that when a rabbi forcefully stands up to abusers, and rails publicly against abuse, that rabbi is branded as courageous. What a shame it is, that standing up for elementary values is courageous.

The rabbi who fights abuse is not courageous. Rather, the rabbi who is silent in the face of abuse is a coward. Let us not lose sight of this vital distinction.

The religious community has a legitimate claim to represent what Judaism ought to be, and the leadership of that community can likewise claim to be the leaders of the Jewish people.

But that claim is legitimate only if carried out in a responsible, forthright, and uncompromising way. Groups who espouse violence must be rejected a priori. Abusers, no matter how religious, must be denounced, in public if need be and denied the advantages of community.

Pedophiles must be dealt with swiftly and strictly. There is no greater desecration of God's Name than to be silent in the face of these breaches of elementary decency.

And we must vehemently reject derogatory attitudes to others, no matter who they are. The derogation is wrong for so many reasons, not the least of which being that it breeds a false and unwarranted sense of superiority. Worse, it puts into place a process of delegitimization that leads to nothing good.

It hurts to write this. It hurts even more to realize that it is necessary to write this. But it is better to swallow this painful pill, and react with resolve, than to allow the hurt and pain, the ignominy and shame, of wayward thinking gone violent, and violent behavior gone haywire.

Rabbi Bulka is the spiritual leader of Congregation Machzikei Hadas in Ottawa.

Ghastly massacre spawns numerous repercussions

By YISRAEL HAREL

At Baruch Goldstein's funeral this week in Kiryat Arba, his friends felt a need to praise him to journalists.

They said his act was a mitzvah meant to save the people of Israel, the land of Israel, and Jewish settlements in Judea, Samaria and Gaza.

The massacre in Hebron was not for the sake of Eretz Yisrael or the settlers. It was against them, against all that is sacred and precious to us, that 118 bullets were fired by Baruch Goldstein.

This Purim "gift" — our vocabulary does not have a more sarcastic term to apply to the massacre — was delivered not just to the dead, the wounded, and their families. Goldstein sent his gift to the Jewish residents of Judea, Samaria and Gaza, as well as Israel proper. Here are some of the components:

• The "mitzvah" will bring a bloodbath in its wake, whose main victims will likely be pure and innocent civilians like those on the Brooklyn Bridge last week and those of Kiryat Arba and other settlements and in the rest of Eretz Yisrael who will be murdered in revenge. And in the current atmosphere of incitement and breastbeating at the massacre, the general public has been conditioned to show understanding for future murderers. As a result, the settlers, not the killers, will be held responsible for the casualties.

• The government, forced to redouble its efforts "to save" the collapsing Oslo agreement, will make further concessions. These could eventually lead to the attainment of a long-held goal of Yasser Arafat and Meretz adherents: the disarming of the settlements in stages, with Jewish Hebron, over which so much blood has spilled, likely to be the first victim.

• The release of some 1,000 Palestinian terrorists, which is like handing them and potential murderers a licence to continue slaying Jews.

• The Oslo process, in all its gravity, succeeded in easing the pressure on foreign countries, especially the United States. Now, to accelerate the peace process, the Americans have summoned the Arabs and Israel to Washington and will present their longstanding plan: retreat to the 1949 borders, including Jerusalem.

• Resentment is felt toward Kiryat Arba and the other settlements in Judea, Samaria, and Gaza by a not insignificant portion of Israeli society, including many whose basic instinct is national but whose Jewish soul absolutely cannot acquiesce in such massacres.

The public tells itself that if this is the price we must pay occasionally for maintaining settlements (and the memory of the Jewish underground also comes to mind) then the inescapable conclusion is that the two peoples must be separated. That includes the evacuation of the Jews from Kiryat Arba and Hebron, a policy which enjoys the support of a majority in the government.

• Before Israel's establishment when the disturbances ran riot in the land, Jews were forced to travel in convoys; now, 60 years later, we are being forced to return to the travel procedures of a besieged society — and to do so in Kiryat Arba, which bears the flag of Israeli pride and fought faithfully through the years for Israel's honor.

For years, those hating the settlements, including champions of law and justice, sought to impose emergency regulations on the Jewish residents of these strongholds, thus equating their standing with that of the Arabs.

Now, in addition to all the moral, security, settlement, and political "achievements" of the massacre, emergency regulations have been imposed. For it is not difficult to mobilize support from a conformist attorney-general, the self-righteous media, and academia's legalists. That backing is provided with relish.

And those are just some of the political, security, psychological, and existential results to be visited on us because of this ghastly massacre.

"He was a righteous man," assert those who knew him well; perhaps, but the moment he trained his gun at the backs of the men kneeling in prayer in the Machpela Cave, he ceased being righteous and became a mass murderer. There should be no mourning for him.

Several people, including some halachic authorities, saw the killing as a mitzvah. If that's the case, I have no part in such mitzvot. To the best of my understanding and knowledge, the thrust of Judaism and the great majority of the observant settlers in Judea, Samaria, and Gaza reject this interpretation.

In a deed which aroused passions almost 26 years ago, Rabbi Moshe Levinger and a group of pioneers laid the foundation for the renewal of Jewish settlement in Hebron and subsequently in the rest of Judea, Samaria, and Gaza.

In the same period, a child was growing up in New York named Baruch Goldstein who probably didn't know about the historic act of Rabbi Levinger. He later chose to become a lethal agent in demolishing the foundations of the Jewish community in Hebron and elsewhere in Judea, Samaria, and Gaza.

And the founding father of the settlement movement does not see that his handiwork is sinking in the sea. In a trance of self-destruction, and in the name of Israel's honor, he refuses to draw the necessary conclusions from the terrible act and continues to preach his message.

After Hebron

As of this writing the grief and rage at the Hebron murders continue unabated. The hearts of all decent people are still in distress. The streets of many Palestinian communities are still in turmoil. And the peace process has been halted.

But it is now time to put the heinous incident into perspective and to provide a context to its evil perpetration.

The crime was unprecedented. Never before in Israel's history had a Jew committed, in the words of Israel's Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, such "a frightening expression of cruelty, devoid of human morality." It was isolated, detestable behavior condemned and abhorred by the vast majority of all Israel. It was not the norm. It was an aberration.

Though numbed by shock and sheer disgust at the murders, the government of Israel reacted swiftly and unequivocally. To its credit it was not immobilized. Seeking to uproot the pathology and to protect the peace process, the government invoked measures to curb extreme, militant, Israeli violence. It established a commission of inquiry. And it released hundreds of Palestinian prisoners and detainees. It is also considering other possible interventions against those individuals who have publicly declared war against the effort to negotiate peace.

Israel's key objective is to shelter the peace process from the extremists who are intent on destroying any chance for co-existence and reconciliation. This must also be the objective of the PLO. Sheltering the peace process requires equal resolve on their part as well — and equally unequivocal words and actions.

PLO leader Yasser Arafat and his advisers should publicly reinvest the Declaration of Principles with commitment and confidence; they must condemn the use of terror and violence by all persons. That means by Palestinians — Hamas, Fatah, individuals — and by those terror groups sponsored by Arab governments.

The sorrow and contrition that during the past two weeks have almost overwhelmed Jewish Israelis, from the President of Israel to the ordinary citizen, has no precedent among any other leadership or society in the blood-soaked history of the Middle East. Not when innocent Jewish children were killed in Ma'alot; not when Israeli Olympic athletes died in Munich; not when a Canadian Jewish teenager was killed by a bomb buried on a Tel Aviv beach; and not when 35 Israelis died in a series of terrorist attacks after the handshake in Washington last fall.

Peace can only be achieved if both parties return to the table with an equal commitment to that peace. The PLO must make it absolutely clear, as Israel has already done, that there is no place in the process for the extremist, the hater, and the terrorist.

Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin has committed the Jewish nation to what he has called the "irreversible road to peace." May history record that, while the road to peace passed through Hebron, it did not end there.

Yasher koach

Not many Jewish dance groups outside of Israel can lay claim to 30 years of public performance.

That is why the Winnipeg-based Sarah Sommer Chai Folk Ensemble deserves a special yasher koach for its three decades of original and creative dance work.

In 1964, Sarah Sommer, a young West Kildonan housewife, began to teach Israeli dancing to eight young girls who were actively pursuing dance studies in ballet and other forms of dance.

Sommer, who died tragically before her 40th birthday in 1969, had been teaching Israeli dancing as far back as her teen years, in Zionist groups such as Young Judaea and Habonim.

A strong disciplinarian, Sommer worked her young students hard and the experiment paid off handsomely. For 30 years the Chai Folk Ensemble has been entertaining audiences all over Canada with the beauty of Israeli, chassidic and experimental dance routines.

A 30th anniversary performance of the group was widely acclaimed in Winnipeg's Centennial Concert Hall in late January. More than 1,300 spectators, including five of the original members of the dance troupe, gathered to participate in a tribute to the group's founder Sarah Sommer, and to enjoy samples of the ensemble's repertoire of dances.

In addition to traditional Israeli and Yiddish folk dancing (the latter included a piece called melava malke, featuring prominent Winnipeg Yiddishist Noah Witman as a white-bearded rabbi presiding over a schoolful of yeshiva students), the Chai Ensemble also presented a new dance choreographed by Evans Coffie of Ghana. In this number, Hebrew lyrics were joined to African rhythms.

The Chai Ensemble represents the best in Canada's cultural community, as it combines the rich trapestry of Jewish and Israeli traditional dance culture with the most modern tastes.

Canadian Jews join their friends in Winnipeg in saluting the outstanding achievements of the Chai Folk Ensemble.

SETTLEMENTS OR PEACE

Our collective communal outrage at the murders in Hebron is now followed by concern over the fate of the peace negotiations. What can be done to get these negotiations back on track?

Given the intense and widespread reaction to the killing among the Palestinians, it is becoming increasingly clear that no meaningful negotiations can occur unless there is some Israel/PLO understanding about the future of the settlements. While the Oslo accord deliberately left this question off the current agenda, the massacre on Feb. 25 has forced the issue back onto the negotiating table.

In an effort to reach out to the Palestinians, the Israeli government vigorously condemned the killings, issued a warrant for the arrest of five Kach leaders, vowed to disarm the Kahane extremists, offered to accept international observers in the territories, announced financial compensation for the families of the victims and advanced, by a few weeks, the release of 500 Palestinian prisoners. While these measures are commendable, they are not likely to break the current political impasse.

Shalom Achshav (Peace Now) in Israel, in assessing the gravity of the situation, has called for the removal of the settlements in the heart of Hebron. It is difficult, from this distance, to assess whether this proposal has a chance of getting Rabin's approval or whether, if implemented, it would get the PLO to resume negotiations.

In any case, the events of the past week have confirmed what we "peaceniks" have been saying for years: Israel must choose between settlements and peace. It cannot have both.

DEFENDS QUOTATION

Permit me a few observations concerning your article, "MP quotes Hitler in newsletter" (Feb.17). You quote Renee Switzer Bellas, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region, saying the quotation of Hitler's was offensive to all Canadians. This is simply not so. There is nothing in this quotation or in the context in which it was presented that in any way espouses racism or bigotry. On the contrary, it is a warning. I find the quotation, "What luck for rulers that men do not think" highly appropriate in the context of the newsletter alerting citizens of our free country to be vigilant in defence of their liberties. Abba Eban was similarly quoted.

Is Stalin never to be quoted because it may offend Ukranians whose ancestors died in his famines? Is Mussolini never to be quoted because it may offend the sensibilities of Ethiopians? Nonsense.

Laurie Goldstein in the Toronto Sun and a recent editorial in the Globe and Mail have eloquently deplored such sophomoric thinking by the likes of the Canadian Jewish Congress.

Shame on the B'nai Brith and shame on Preston Manning for succumbing to such mindless ethnic hypersensitivity.

GIVE YIDDISH ITS DUE

As one of the people Amy Sattin interviewed for her article "Yiddish Classes On The Rise" (Jan. 27), I would like to make a correction on one of her statements about me: ". . . she instructs . . . in the language of her parents' prewar Polish home." To be more precise — I instruct in the language of my current Canadian home. Both my children are trilingual (Yiddish, English and French) and we continue to speak Yiddish in our home. To us and to many Jews it is a language of the present which also binds us to our past.

The rest of Miss Sattin's article made me angry! Not at her, but at a community that allows such attitudes as were expressed by her other interviewees to continue unchallenged. "Students aren't going for it;" ". . . does not draw much interest;" "It's a supply and demand situation," etc. When was the last time a school asked its students whether they want to learn Mishnah, Hebrew or math? I wonder how many children would opt for those subjects when put alongside computer studies, for example.

How do children know whether they want to learn Yiddish if they've never been given the opportunity to study it? Students at Bialik Hebrew Day School accept Yiddish as part of their curriculum and don't think to question it. The joy and pleasure with which Bialik children begin to learn Yiddish carries on through the ensuing years. One just has to attend an assembly at our school and hear them singing Yiddish songs to know that this is as much a part of them as anything else they learn at our school. If other Jewish schools included Yiddish as a matter of course, it would be a natural part of Jewish education.

Students going into CHAT are offered Yiddish as a non-credit elective under General Studies. Since when does Yiddish belong in General Studies? What kind of message are we giving our students about an integral part of our Jewish cultural heritage?

Bialik High School in Montreal, where I taught Yiddish before moving to Toronto, has a more demanding French studies program and is able to include Yiddish in its Jewish curriculum not as an option but as part of its reading course of studies. It's a matter of fact, it is not a choice!

Rediscovering the Jews of Hawaii

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

We recently were in Hawaii for our second visit. The first one was in 1981 when we spent a few days in Honolulu, on our way home from New Zealand. This journey was different.

I had accepted the invitation of the Jewish community to spend the month of February with them. The synagogue is presently looking for a permanent rabbi, and while the search is on, a number of us who are retired from pulpit obligations have filled the vacuum. It has been a fascinating experience.

As in any sunny climate, there are two types of communities: the residents and the "snow birds" (the common name for vacationers). A rabbi, of course, must serve both, though my main responsibility lay with the local community.

Hawaii consists of a number of islands and is the 50th state of the United States. It differs from the other states in two major respects: it is five hours' air travel away from the mainland and its population is one large ethnic mix, found nowhere else on the continent. It has indigenous people who lately have staged a sovereignty movement, for which they find surprising popular support from other groups.

Jews have lived in the islands for some time. According to Kirk Cashmere, chronicler of Hawaiian Jewish life, the first Jews arrived about 150 years ago and soon established business enterprises. They had come from Prussia and Austria and went westward from California when the gold rush ended. In 1901 the first congregation was founded and not long thereafter disbanded. But clearly, Jews had come to stay and, with World War II infusing both military and civilian Jewish personnel, a community centre was established which, in 1950, became Temple Emanu-El. Today Cashmere owns the only Jewish property in Honolulu or anywhere on the islands, a lovely synagogue, with educational and social facilities and a very respectable library.

Rabbi Plaut

While the synagogue is affiliated with the Reform movement, its membership covers the whole gamut of practice and conviction, with the Orthodox component conducting their own separate services on Shabbat mornings. Since they do not permit aliyot for women, a Conservative congregation has been formed as well. It is separate from the temple, but a number of its members belong to both institutions.

There are currently six rabbis in Honolulu. They serve the temple, the Navy chapel at Pearl Harbour, the Jewish Federation and the newly-formed Lubavitch congregation. In addition, a retired Hillel rabbi guides the Conservative shul (Sof Ma'arav) and a former rabbi at Emanu-El has formed a second Reform temple (Beth Shalom).

The university has a Rambam scholar in the department of Philosophy, and a classic professor who is in the process of publishing a book on Jewish history. Former Israelis are the core of the small Hebrew speaking contingent, and I found a number of others whose Jewish knowledge is good. Generally, the level of knowledge is not much different from the average American town. After all, people have come from everywhere.

But that does not mean that they live in an average community, nor do they conform to the conventions of average American Jews. They live amongst people who are heavily mixed ethnically and racially: Polynesian (the sizeable indigenous element), Japanese, Chinese, South-East Asian, Filipino, African and Caucasian. In this social climate intermarriage between members of various groups is more the norm than the exception, and this has affected the Jewish community as well. Jewishly-raised children will often exhibit backgrounds of the other communities and, needless to say, Jewish education faces an uphill battle. One great plus: anti-Semitism is imperceptible.

Affiliation with the existing institutions — religious, social and fraternal — remains small, the lowest anywhere in the United States. Giving to the Federation is far below the national average, even though United Way scores fourth amongst the larger cities in the United States. Isolation and mobility add to the problem.

Participation in communal affairs parallels that of other American comunities. Hawaii's Attorney General is Jewish, and so is one of the state's Supreme Court justices.

How many Jews live on the islands? No one knows for sure, for many of them prefer to remain anonymous. Estimates are as high as 15,000 to 18,000, with most of them on Oahu. There are small congregations on Maui and the Big Island as well, but the action is in Oahu, where Honolulu is located, a bustling major metropolitan centre today.

And, of course, you see the tourists, especially in Waikiki, where we resided. Scenery and climate are spectacular, with mountains and volcanoes rising from the ocean, and daily temperatures around 27 degrees. In a way it's a never-never land, and one wonders how we will make it in such an environment. But it's a wonderful place to visit.

'Stay-at-home mom' tells the reason why

By KAREN GOLD

Being a "stay-at-home mom" is certainly not as common nowadays as it was in the '50s or '60s, but there are still lots of us around, at least in my neighborhood. That being the case, however, I recently realized that virtually every one of my friends who has one or more preschool age children has gone back to work outside of the home. After I'd had conversations with all of them, each one, without exception, came out with exactly the same comments at some point.

Not one of them could comprehend how I could possibly stand staying at home with my children and enduring the long hours of boring drudgery day in and day out. They were referring, of course, to changing diapers, dealing with three daily meals and the resulting mess, endless trips to the playground and noisy parent/child drop-in centres, watching Sesame Street and all the other children's shows and generally talking baby talk all day long.

All of the aforementioned activities are definitely tedious, but the realization that it will all end in the not too distant future makes it possible for me to deal with it now. Actually, some mothers I've spoken to insist that they enjoy every moment of it and genuinely don't want it all to end. But we all know that someday our kids will be in school full time, that the house will no longer have toys scattered from top to bottom and, once again, that we'll be able to drink a cup of coffee or have a telephone conversation without interruption. (Some career parents can at least do this at the office, which must be part of the reason why they enjoy going to work). In the meantime, this is what I've chosen for myself and my children, and it bothers me when so many others imply that there is something intellectually inferior or almost subhuman about my decision.

The way I figure it, there are four main reasons for going back to work after having a baby: (1) you absolutely have to or you'll lose your house; (2) you can meet your mortgage or rent payments and other bills but your budget will be extremely tight and you really want those little extras; (3) your career is just taking off and to leave work now, even for a few years, would cause irreversible damage to it; or (4) you would much rather work outside the home than look after young children all day. (Note: I said these were the four main reasons — I'm sure there are others that I haven't included.)

Now let's look at the reasons why you would choose to quit your job after having a baby. Again, I would say there are four main ones: (1) you don't really need a second income (you were only working to have something to do until the baby came along); (2) you could use a second income to buy all those little extras but you can get by without it; (3) your job wasn't really a career and/or you didn't enjoy working; or (4) no job or career is as important to you as taking care of your own children all day.

I believe that all of the above reasons are valid for either choosing to go back to work or deciding to stay at home. However, the next time someone looks at me as if I must be insane to want to be a full-time mom I may just blurt out my own deepest thoughts on the subject.

I might ask them how they can possibly stand the thought of some stranger (either a daycare worker, nanny or babysitter) spending all those hours every day with their child, being the first one to witness all those precious milestones in a baby's early years. Perhaps the caregiver won't respond to the child's needs as quickly and lovingly as a parent. For these reasons, I chose to stay home to look after my own children.

I also wonder how working parents can survive the mad rush every morning to get everyone dressed, fed and out of the house by a specific time so that no one is late for work or daycare. (School-age children are a little older and usually able to dress and feed themselves, not to mention emotionally more ready to handle such tight schedules.) Then there is the mad rush after work, to buy some groceries, stop off at the cleaners, pick up the kids and then try to make dinner while their children climb all over them, in constant need of attention from not seeing their parents all day.

I guess what it all boils down to is that old saying, "to each his own." So, please, all you working parents out there, don't put me down for wanting to be a "stay-at-home mom," and I promise not to criticize you for putting your career first. Neither viewpoint is fair. These are not decisions that were made lightly, so let us give them their due respect.

Passover record book has some interesting entries

By ALLAN GOULD

My very dear friend and personal rabbi, Martin Lockshin, recently shared a joke with me. (The joke may not be original with Rabbi L, but then, he didn't write the Torah, either, and we enjoy that, together, too).

The story goes that a middle-aged Jewish couple drift away from their faith, and eventually convert to another religion. Years go by, and the husband and wife slowly but surely become interested in Judaism, and begin to study it in depth. Finally, the moment comes when the husband says to the wife, "You know, I really think we should become Jews — truly observant Jews — again."

And the wife replies, "I agree. But could we wait until after Passover?"

I pause for your laughter — especially my female readers. As I'm sure you will all agree, for all its importance — indeed, its centrality to our religion — Pesach is not a very easy holiday to observe: the complex avoidance of chometz; the four holy days; the seders; many special laws and observances. One really cannot blame the woman in the joke for wanting to wait until after the holiday to return to our faith.

Which leads me to some great records, achievements and concerns of this most essential of all Jewish holidays. But before I begin to list them, a note to my most religious readers: There were no bread products anywhere near my computer when I typed this column. Okay?

THE MOST CREATIVE USES FOR MATZAH

1. As a frisbee to toss around the table during lengthy dissertations by Rabbi Berel Waskansky; Lvov, Poland, April, 1887.

2. As third base during an important baseball game in a Brooklyn sandlot during the Intermediate Days of Passover; New York City, April 18, 1953.

3. As a hot-plate on which to place cholent on the Sabbath of Pesach in the home of Jack Zaldin of Baltimore, Maryland; April 6, 1969.

THE SHORTEST TIME TO KOSHER A STOVE FOR PASSOVER

1. Joe and Betty Sondheim, after five months' practice, managed to kosher their stove in time for Pesach in April, 1987, in less than 12 minutes, using a Black and Decker acetylene torch. "It's an ugly job, but it had to be done," stated Mrs. Sondheim, pushing her welding glasses back from her eyes. "I've had it with Easy-Off. This [pointing to her torch] is my Easy-Off!"

2. Harold and Roz Berman of Whitney Pier, Nova Scotia, decided to kosher their home for Pesach on April 3, 1973, by setting fire to it. "It wasn't an easy decision," laughed Harold from his detention cell in Sydney, where he was being held for arson. "But the house was hopeless. Crumbs in the living room, crumbs in the den; even crumbs in the beds. It would have taken us years to make it useable for Passover. So Roz will spend this holiday at a Kosher hotel in Miami Beach — I hear they're really nice — and I'm on a hunger strike until they provide me with matzah. At least in jail, there's not much bread around, ya know. And concrete is much easier to clean than shag rugs. You should have seen it — crumbs everywhere!"

Allan Gould

THE MOST DISPUTED FOODS, REGARDING THEIR KASHRUT, FOR PASSOVER

1. Beans, peas, lentils, rice, millet, sesame and sunflower seeds, and corn, for Ashkenazi Jews.

2. Vinegar, baking soda and baking powder, for most Jews, regardless of their religious leanings and backgrounds.

3. Being invited to a seder by your favorite relatives, who declared, "I know we're not strictly kosher all year, but we've been extra careful just so you can join us."

THE FIVE MOST COMMON MISSUNDERSTANDINGS ABOUT PASSOVER

1. Karpas, the green vegetable symbolizing spring and rebirth and dipped in salt water early in the seder service, is not named for Al Karpas, a famous American-Jewish gangster of earlier in this century. Shame on you for even thinking that.

2. Passover wine does not have to be over 95 per cent sugar; it usually only tastes that way.

3. The beytzah, or roasted egg, which sits on the Passover plate, is a symbol of the sacrifices made during the festival in times of the Temple, and not of the Canadian economy in its resemblance to a zero.

4. The arba banim, or four sons of the Passover service, were not originally named Ryan, Izzy, Clint and Jason.

THE SHARPEST MAROR EVER RECORDED

The maror, or horseradish, of Reb Moshe Kapoya (the Dizzy) of Ozerov, Poland, which burned through his Pesach plate and right through his table; April 22, 1916. It was later confiscated by the United States government, and reportedly was used to bring the Great War to an early end. Since the United States has consistently denied using chemical warfare, this has never been verified.

THE MOST GENEROUS AFIKOMAN GIFT ON RECORD

Dustin Dembrowsky, the nine-year-old son of Dr. Harvey Dembrowsky of Houston, Texas, the world-renowned heart-transplant specialist, plastic surgeon, Talmudic scholar, stockbroker and plumber, held out and finally received the Caribbean island of St. Kitts; April 14, 1991. Dustin demanded, and finally got, a private Lear jet to reach his island during Pesach, 1992, and a 100-foot yacht during Pesach, 1993. He hopes to get a Nintendo this year.

Toronto-based author and lecturer Allan Gould is the author of 19 books, including a serious anthology of 350 famous Gentiles, What Did They Think Of The Jews? and his latest, a major anthology of the best comedy of his chosen country, The Great Big Book of Canadian Humour. He wishes all his readers a joyous, healthy, and — of course! — kosher Passover.

Russian book will honor Jewish soldiers

In Moscow, Sheldon Kirshner interviews a Soviet war hero.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

A project that would have been suppressed during the stultifying Soviet era is being readied for completion in 1995, the 50th anniversary of the end of World War II.

A memorial book, enshrining the role of Red Army Jewish soldiers in that conflict, will be published under the auspices of the Jewish Invalids and War Veterans' Union (JIWVU) and the Confederation of Jewish Organizations and Communities (Vaad).

Soviet authorities would have frowned upon it as particularistic, nationalistic or worse. But with the demise of communism and the rise of democracy in Russia, a volume of this kind presents no ideological problems.

"All of us who took part in the Great Patriotic War feel duty-bound to perpetuate the memory of Jewish warriors who were killed and are missing in action," explained Moses Maryanovsky, chairman of the JIWVU and a recipient of the Soviet Union's equivalent of the Medal of Honor.

Five hundred thousand Soviet Jews were conscripted into the Red Army and 200,000 fell, the majority fighting the Nazi hordes.

Jewish soldiers, pilots and sailors distinguished themselves on all fronts:

•Michael Plotkin commanded the first squadron to bomb Berlin in August 1941, two months after Hitler ordered the invasion of the Soviet Union.

•Brig.-Gen. Jacob Kreiser was mentioned in dispatches in the decisive battle for Moscow.

All told, 60,000 Jewish troops were decorated for heroism in the course of World War II. One hundred and forty five Jews, one-third posthumously, received the highest award, Hero of the Soviet Union.

Maryanovsky was one of the recipients.

A major in the tank corps, he joined the Red Army in 1941 at the age of 21. At the time, he was a worker in an automobile plant in Moscow.

Maryanovsky, a native of Ukraine, was assigned to the 187th brigade after finishing a tankist course in the city of Gorky. He served on the Western front, between Moscow and Bryansk.

In 1943, he was severely wounded near Moscow when his tank sustained a direct hit. He spent four months in a military hospital.

Having recovered, he was posted to the 23rd tank brigade in Belorussia.

In the summer of 1944, Maryanovsky's unit was ordered to capture the high ground held by the Germans on the western bank of the Dnepr River. The well-entrenched Germans had the advantage.

As the 23rd tried crossing on hastily-erected pontoon bridges, they were met by fierce German resistance. The casualties were frightful.

"The Dnepr became red with the blood of Soviet soldiers," recalls Maryanovsky.

The battles raged for three days and nights, until the Soviets were finally able to surround, and subdue, an entire German army group.

The victory, which paved the way for the capture of the town of Mogilov, came at a bitter price.

Maryanovsky's commanding officer was killed, as were one-third of his men. Many more were maimed. Maryanovsky, though badly wounded in the assault, fought bravely and smartly. Senior officers credited Maryanovsky with having helped turn the tide. His valor earned him the Hero of the Soviet Union.

Hospitalized yet again, Maryanovsky returned to the front several months later. He was sent to Poland. There, he was wounded for the third and last time.

He spent about two years in hospital, where surgeons attended to his wounds. The operations were considered successful, but surgeons were unable to remove grenade fragments from his head, arms and lungs, and he carries them to this day.

Yet he was more fortunate than his brother, who was killed during the war.

Demobilized from the army in 1947, just about a year before Stalin launched his notorious anti-cosmopolitan (read anti-Semitic) campaign, Maryanovsky enrolled at Moscow State University to study history. After graduating, he taught the subject at an institute.

Maryanovsky was a member of the Communist party from 1941 until the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991. He did not jump ship, like some communists, after the advent of perestroika and glasnost in the mid-1980s.

"I was a Communist to the end," he said.

But his party credentials did not shield him from the sting of state anti-Semitism. He, too, was affected by it, a topic he is loath to discuss.

These days, Maryanovsky is hard at work on the memorial book, which will list the names of every Jewish soldier who fought in the Red Army.

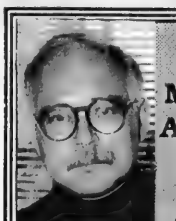
He has secured the co-operation of the president of the Vaad, Mikhail Chlenov, and established contact with the Historic Archival Centre of the Russian armed forces and the Moscow Scientific Research Institute.

"We are already gathering and registering the names and data of Jewish warriors," he said.

Last year, Maryanovsky met with Yitzhak Arad, the chairman of the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial in Jerusalem, who expressed an interest in the endeavor.

Maryanovsky has no doubt that the project is long overdue. "No steps were taken all these years to perpetuate the memory of those who fell. Our book will be a literary memorial to the fallen."

Moses Maryanovsky in 1945 as a highly decorated soldier in the Red Army.



Mideast Analysis

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

A'man, Israel's military intelligence, lacks the public image of the Mossad and the Shin Bet, the agencies in charge of external and internal operations. Yet according to Samuel Katz, a keen observer of the Israel Defence Force, A'man is Israel's "true shield."

By executing its mandate of gathering, analyzing and disseminating accurate intelligence, A'man protects Israel from conventional and unconventional attack, writes Katz in Soldier Spies (Presidio Press, $21.95 U.S.), a generally sober account of its history.

But A'man is not infallible. Its covert operation in Egypt in 1954 floundered. A'man failed to predict the 1967 Six Day War and the 1973 Yom Kippur War. It was surprised by Anwar Sadat's dramatic announcement of his intention to visit Jerusalem.

These failures, however serious, should not leave the impression that A'man — which is under the direct control of the chief of staff and the minister of defence — is a bumbling organization.

Perish the thought.

One of A'man's first successes occurred on the high seas. On the eve of the 1948 War of Independence, A'man operatives sunk the Lino, a ship ferrying arms and munitions to Syria. The Syrians recovered the weapons and loaded them aboard a leased Italian vessel, the SS Argiro. Just outside the Egyptian port of Alexandria, A'man hijacked the SS Argiro and diverted it to Haifa. The cache included eight million rounds of ammunition.

At times, A'man gathers intelligence by sending commandos into enemy territory. In 1954, a commando force sneaked past the heavily-fortified frontier into Syria and attached eavesdropping devices to the telephone lines linking Syrian fortifications along the Golan Heights. They proved extremely successful.

Around the same time, A'man secretly reconnoitered the Sinai to determine whether or not an armored and mechanized advance would be feasible through its rough terrain. The information enabled the Israeli general staff to draw up plans for the 1956 Sinai Campaign.

Military intelligence

Two agents recruited by A'man, Eli Cohen and Wolfgang Lotz, later made illustrious careers in the Mossad. Their exploits in Syria and in Egypt have become the stuff of legend. Far less known are the stories, related in Soldier Spies, of two A'man agents — a Jew and a Muslim — who funnelled vital data from Egypt before the Six Day War.

A'man planted electronic bugs throughout the Sinai, thus affording Israel the opportunity of monitoring supposedly top-secret telephone calls. During the Six Day War, A'man officers taped a revealing conversation between Egyptian President Gamal Abdel Nasser and King Hussein of Jordan. Nasser's boasts of "victories" against Israel convinced King Hussein to enter the war — a mistake he still regrets.

A'man committed a major blunder by underestimating the probability of war with Egypt in 1973. Nine days into the Yom Kippur War, A'man redeemed itself by discovering a crack in Egyptian lines, a development which enabled Israeli armor and infantry to storm across the Suez Canal, establish a beachhead and surround Egypt's Third Army.

A'man performed well in the 1982 Lebanon War. With exacting prescience, its director warned the government that Israel would be unable to destroy the PLO's infrastructure in Lebanon, nor be able to create a new political order there.

But in Katz's estimation, A'man's most important contribution during that war was its success in gathering real-time intelligence by deploying high-flying drones over the battlefield.

Katz believes that one of A'man's chief responsibilities in the future will be to forewarn Israel of potentially threatening developments in the former Soviet Union. Are unemployed Soviet nuclear scientists selling their expertise to the highest bidder? Will the new Muslim republics in Central Asia transfer nuclear secrets to countries like Iran and Libya?

Obviously, A'man has its work cut out in the years ahead.

Kibbutz inspires idealism

By CARL ALPERT

Not every Israeli lives on a kibbutz, and not every Israeli lives in the desert, but this is a story about a kibbutz in the wilderness wastes of the Arava. Its members are a breed to admire, for they are perhaps the last stronghold of the idealism which once served as the hallmark of the kibbutz movement. And their ability to overcome difficulties and to carve out an economically sound and spiritually rewarding way of life here deserves attention.

Our visit was to Ketura, population 350 (115 of them children), half of them Americans, a good many of whom are graduates of the Young Judea movement. What attracted them to this place, and why do they stay? It quickly become clear, in conversations, that they were not drawn by the desert, but once located here they fell in love with the surroundings.

Ketura is 40 miles north of Eilat, between the mountains of Moab on the Jordan side of the wilderness and the stony hills of the Negev to the west. There are fresh water springs, and the settlers have been able to transform the desert into a flowering paradise where the melons, peppers, dates and grapefruit which they grow reach markets in Europe before they are available from other sources. Their herd of cows provides dairy products which, merchandised through their neighboring kibbutz, Yotvata, are known throughout Israel.

But Ketura is also a cultural and spiritual oasis. From its very beginnings, 20 years ago, it emphasized the cultural elements of life, beginning with drama, music, arts and crafts and photography. The spirit of the kibbutz and the influence of nature provide an environment in which art and poetry can flourish — and do.

Ketura is unique in another aspect as well. It is a pluralistic society in which religiously observant members live in close and tolerant harmony with their non-religious colleagues. What do they mean by religious? Jeremy Benstein explained that the usual lines cannot be drawn, for to an Israeli anyone who is not Orthodox is said to be non-religious. Yet there are gradations of religious response and feeling. Four members wear a kipa. The kitchen is kosher, and services are held on the Sabbath for those who wish it, but others may go off to discuss at other settlements, and cars can enter the grounds on Shabbat.

The first born in Ketura, Nadav Soloway, is a true child of the desert. He is now 17, and admits that when he goes north he is struck by the abundance of trees, green plants and water. He wants to help bring more of that greenery to his home as well.

Life on a kibbutz is not for everybody, and all the more so a kibbutz in the desert; there have been families that have left, but always newcomers to replace them. Ketura has thus far been a holdout in the ideological decline among kibbutzim. There is little trend to privatization, and private TV sets for each family were approved only at the time of the Gulf War. There is still a strict rule against hired labor from the outside, and all the functions of the agricultural fields and the dairy farm are performed by members. They accept the services of volunteers from abroad, who come here for the unique experience.

Some members provide income for the kibbutz by working outside as teachers, gardeners, bookkeepers, biologists, lawyers, social workers, physical therapists and veterinarians in Eilat or other Arava settlements.

The high level of education, and the unique setting, have led Ketura to set up a format for study courses of long and short term seminars for high school and university students, senior citizens and other groups. Contents are tailored to requirements. It is hoped that this Jewish-Zionist-Wilderness program will be a memorable experience for its participants, and a generator of revenue for the kibbutz as well.

We spent four days there, under the auspices of the Continuing Education Program of the Association of Americans and Canadians in Israel, and can recommend it heartily to groups looking for something new and meaningful.

Ketura is interested in absorbing new members, especially young singles and couples. Their address: Kibbutz Ketura, D.N. Hevel Eilat 88840, Israel.

Eliav optimistic on peace

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

Arie Eliav

TORONTO — Consider a statistical graph with a variety of ups and downs. If you get too close to the chart at a time when the data is indicating a downswing, you get a distorted picture of the overall trend. Sometimes you have to take a step back and look at the bigger picture.

In a sometimes impassioned address at the Holy Blossom Temple last week, former Israeli soldier and Knesset member Arie Eliav described his perspective on the big picture concerning the relationship between Israel and the Palestinians.

The recent massacre in Hebron was one of the downswings on the graph, he suggested. Despite that tragedy, the trend is towards a resolution of the parties' differences, he said.

Those who throw up their hands and say Israelis and Palestinians can never live in peace are ignoring the lessons of history. Recalling his own experiences, Eliav said that as a young soldier in the British Army's Jewish Brigade in 1945, he would never have thought that such mortal enemies as Germany and France would one day be friends. Or that a continent riven by hatreds would one day have a common market, with international borders dissolving. Or even that the flags of West Germany and Israel would fly side by side at Ben Gurion Airport and that as a minister in the Labor government of the mid-1970s, he would greet a statesman from that European country. "But it did happen," he said.

"We are today in a process of peace through compromise," he said. "It's a very difficult goal. . . It's a 100-year conflict, four generations, with hatred and fear. But the road has been taken and there is no road back."

Eliav, who in 1977 helped found the Sheli party, said, "My generation saw Arabs down the barrel of a gun." But the Arab world has undergone important changes over the years. Israel has a full-fledged peace with Egypt, which represents about one-third of the Arab world. Relations with Morocco are good and in Tunisia, "many are changing their views."

He said Israel enjoys a de facto peace with Jordan and that among the Palestinians, there are many who are emulating the late Issam Sartawi, an aide to Arafat, who in the 1970s met with Eliav with the idea of building bridges between the two sides. (Sartawi was killed by forces loyal to terrorist leader Abu Nidal.)

"There is a change [in the Arab world]," he said. "A slow change, with ups and downs."

Eliav became most animated during a question period when commenting on the Kach movement. One of its members, Dr. Baruch Goldstein, shot 39 worshippers at a Hebron mosque recently.

Unlike most other Israelis, Kach members do not want peace, Eliav said. "Their ideology is a continuous war ideology. . . They hate peace, they love war."

Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and many in his cabinet are former soldiers who have fought the Arabs in many wars. "Kach didn't, we did."

He said, "The mood in Israel is not good. There is no quick remedy. But even deep wounds will heal and because the majority of Israelis are sick and tired of the situation we are in, they will support the government in the steps it has taken" to arrest Kach leaders. Even a majority in Likud support these measures, he added.

Eliav pointed to a youth village he has established that he hopes will foster good relations between Arabs and Jews. Called Niezana, it is about 70 kms southwest of Beersheba on the border between Egypt and Israel. "One day it will be a town on the crossroads of three continents," he predicted.

Eliav called on Diaspora Jewry to complement Israeli peace moves by fostering good domestic relations with Palestinians.

Seder offered for AIDS sufferers

TORONTO — The Holy Blossom Temple AIDS committee, Brotherhood and Sisterhood would like to invite all our friends to our fourth annual The Third Seder: A Passover Celebration For Those Affected and Infected by AIDS and HIV.

This year's Seder, one of the outstanding events of the AIDS committee at Holy Blossom, will be held on Wednesday, March 30 at 6:30 p.m. at the 519 Community Centre, 519 Church Street, Toronto. There is no charge but donations are appreciated.

A traditional Passover meal will be served and glatt kosher food will be available on request. As well, transporation is available for those who require it.

The AIDS committee was formed in 1988 as part of a resolution by Holy Blossom Temple to provide a Jewish response to AIDS. The committee is dedicated to meeting the needs of persons affected or infected by HIV and AIDS through programs such as The Third Seder, a memorial service during AIDS Awareness Week, support groups, and the AIDS Assist Buddy Program. The AIDS committee is currently made up of over 65 individuals from various congregations throughout Metro Toronto.

Last year's Seder brought together over 135 people to share in a ceremony of redemption and compassion articulated through a distinctive Haggadah that was compiled especially for the occasion by Jonathan Lampe, past chair of the committee. This year, the need is even greater. These mothers, fathers, sisters, brothers, and lovers need to know that there is a Jewish community that cares.

For more information, to volunteer your time, or to make reservations, please call Deborah in confidence, at 789-3291 by Wednesday, March 16, 1994.

Liberal hopeful targetted for anti-Semitic attack

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An anti-Semitic attack has left a Markham, Ont. man shaken but undeterred in his quest to become the Liberal nominee in the provincial riding of Willowdale.

Howard Shore woke up last Friday morning to find his home had been spray painted with a Star of David, a swastika and the message "Get out of Willow," a reference to Shore's seeking the Liberal nod in Willowdale, now held by Tory Charles Harnick.

The metre-high Star of David was near the front door, while the message and swastika were on the rear of the house. All were daubed in black spray paint. A firm specializing in restoration came to the house the same day the attack took place.

Shore says he's more angry than frightened, and that the attack is an attempt to oust him from the race.

"I'm outraged at this act of cowardice. Someone is trying to intimidate me to drop out of the race," he told The CJN just hours after the vandalism was discovered. "The message said to get out of Willowdale, and I live in Markham."

He said the attack left his wife distraught. The couple's telephone rang for most of Friday, with messages of support from friends and family, as well as B'nai Brith and Canadian Jewish Congress.

Shore also said support came from Ontario Liberal leader Lyn McLeod, who assured him that the party would conduct its own investigation.

A 29-year-old health care consultant, Shore has had his hat in the ring for the Liberal nod in Willowdale since last December. His campaign brochure lists his Jewish communal involvement and that he attended two universities in Israel.

His only opponent so far is Gino Matrundola, who held Willowdale for the Liberals from 1987 to 1990.

Shore said that the night before the attack, he had voiced concerns at a riding association executive meeting that proper procedure on the nomination process was not being followed.

According to Shore, "the atmosphere in the room became heated."

Matrundola said he is "appalled" at the attack.

"I was very sorry to hear what happened," he told The CJN. "I do not condone this type of attack on the Jewish community or on anybody."

He said he "resents" implications that he or members of his campaign had anything to do with the incident.

"We're on the same team. We're Liberals. This is not a political issue, and we had nothing to do with it."

Matrundola said relations between the riding's sizeable Italian and Jewish communities have always been "extremely good," and that his own doctor, lawyer and accountant are Jews.

Bar-Ilan connects to Ukraine

TORONTO — Bar-Ilan University has established a unique centre for remote sensing from space that instantly receives radar information by microwave from a Ukrainian satellite.

Remote sensing is an increasingly important international effort in developing environmental, economic and scientific policy.

An agreeement between Bar-Ilan and the Kharkov Institute for Radiophysics and Electronics of the Ukraine Academy of Science enables data from the Ukrainian radars aboard C.I.S. satellites to be transmitted directly to a receiving station at Bar-Ilan. At the opening of the centre in December 1993, the Okean 3 satellite, launched by the Kharkov Institute, immediately dispatched photographs of an area with a radius of hundreds of kilometres from Ramat-Gan. The photographs, transmitted by microwave, can be received in any weather.

The satellite information will make possible the assessment of crop-growing methods; ecological monitoring of forests and radioactive contamination; search for oil/gas- bearing structures; mapping of mines, pipelines, archaeological remains; and detection of hurricanes and weather changes.

The Ukraine is one of only a handful of industrial nations possessing highly developed space technology and modern satellites. The Kharkov Institute is a world-class facility internationally recognized as a leading pioneer in the application of radiophysics to the field of remote sensing.

Immigration to Israel discussed

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The large number of marriages among Russian immigrants in Israel in which one partner is not Jewish has resulted in a "real problem," a symposium on refugee resettlement in Israel was told recently.

Because there is no separation of state and religion in Israel, "a disturbing problem has resulted over the identity of children in marriages where the mother is not Jewish," Professor Judith T. Shuval said.

The religious parties in the government coalition have been able to restrict performing of marriages and other rites to Orthodox rabbis only, she said.

"This problem is associated with more complicated things than immigration alone," Shuval told the symposium at the York University Centre for Refugee Studies.

"More and more efforts are being made via the courts to fight these issues, to get the right of civil marriages and for marriages to be performed by non-Orthodox rabbis. The Orthodox rabbinate is fighting against these efforts every inch of the way."

Shuval is professor of sociology at Hebrew University, Jerusalem, and visiting fellow at Harvard University.

Arie Lova Eliav, a former deputy minister of immigration in Israel, and Alexander Bligh, lecturer, Hebrew University of Jerusalem and visiting professor of History and Political Science at York University, also spoke.

After only 30 months in Israel, 62 per cent of the 500,000 Russian immigrants who arrived between 1989 and 1992 were employed, about the same percentage of employment as in the Israeli population as a whole, Shuval said. These figures, obtained in February 1992, were based on interviews in their homes by Russian speakers, of 1,200 people between 25 and 64.

The 137,000 Russian immmigrants who arrived in the 1970s had an easier time because there was lower unemployment and a more receptive attitude from the general population. For example, she said, while 95 per cent of physicians arriving in the 1970s were absorbed into medical posts, only 2,000 of the 12,000 who came after 1989 could find work in their profession.

Women in both arrival groups had a harder time than men in finding work, and a lower percentage of the elderly in both migrations managed to find jobs.

Compared to the immigrants of the 70s, those coming between 1989 and 1993 included 80 per cent from areas where there was minimal Jewish identity, more elderly, a higher proportion of single families, mostly headed by women, and a higher number of non-Jews in mixed marriages. Downward mobility in employment was more evident in the second group.

Feedback to Russia from people experiencing difficulty in Israel has resulted in a decrease in the immigration rate in 1992 and 1993, Shuval said, and the future numbers will be linked to anti-Semitism and other factors in Russia. It has also changed the kind of immigrants, the number of engineers arriving falling from 27 per cent in 1990 to 19 per cent in 1992, and the number of unskilled rising from 15 to 25 per cent in the same periods.

Absorption of the immigrants depends on growth in the economy and in a successful peace process, she said. "Despite major setbacks like the Hebron massacre, in the long run the peace process will take place — not as soon as some of us hope."

During a round table discussion, Eliav said he believes there are another 500,000 Russian Jews "on the road" to Israel and that it will be more difficult for the country to absorb them than the previous immigrants.

Leases for 4.5 million dunams of land given to Arab refugees expire in four years and this poses an interesting problem for those working on self-rule for Palestinians, Bligh told the symposium.

A. M. Brown, an Israeli who is a post-doctoral fellow at York and who organized and chaired the symposium, said the Hebron massacre was symbolic of the tension and problems surrounding resettlement of refugees in Israel. "This is a crazy deed done by a crazy person," he said. "Nonetheless the plurality of responses to it from both sides, Arabs and Jews, as well as from others, illustrates the complexity of the conflict."

Responding to a question, Shuval said the rate at which Russian immigrants are leaving Israel has remained constant at three per cent, as it was in the 70s.

Dr. Harold and Susan Merskey

London Negev Dinner to honor Merskeys

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

LONDON, Ont. — When Dr. Harold and Susan Merskey left London, England, in 1976 to settle in London, Ont., they lost little time in getting involved in their new community.

The Jewish community and Jewish causes, local volunteer groups and professional organizations have all benfitted from their commitment and willing service.

In recognition, the community will pay tribute to the couple at the London Jewish National Fund's fifth annual Negev Tribute Dinner on Sunday, April 17, at the Jewish Community Centre's Harris Room.

Special guest speaker will be Consul General Colette Avital from New York. The dinner chair will be Dr. Ben Goldberg and proceeds from the event will go towards reforesting the barren Mt. Scopus hillside, part of JNF Canada's Redeemers of Jerusalem program.

An internationally renowned authority on pain, Harold was born and raised in Sunderland. He attended Oxford University, where he qualified in medicine in 1953 and subsequently received his doctorate in medicine.

He went on to train in psychiatry and following appointments to hospitals in Nottingham and London, was appointed director of education and research at London (Ont.) Psychiatric Hospital in 1976.

Currently director of research at the same hospital, Harold is also professor of psychiatry at the University of Western Ontario Medical School, with cross-appointments to the departments of epidemiology, occupational therapy, the facial pain research unit and the Faculty of Dentistry.

He is a member of numerous professional societies in England, Canada and the United States, and is past president of the Canadian Pain Society.

His principal research interests include the study of pain; dementia, specifically Alzheimer's disease; conversion and dissociative disorders, including multiple personality; and false memory syndrome.

He has published extensively and as chair, since 1974, of the task force on taxonomy of the International Association for the Study of Pain, he has been responsible for developing and editing the International Classification of Chronic Pain Syndromes.

A native of Yorkshire, Susan received her BA in French from Hull University in 1961 and a postgraduate diploma in library science from the University of London in 1964. In 1987, she completed her MA in history at UWO.

A writer and editor, she is managing editor of the London Jewish Community News and also works as a freelance editor.

Married in 1965 and the parents of three young children — Helen, now married and living in the UK, and Ruth and Alan, both students at the University of Toronto — both became involved with the London Community Hebrew Day School.

While Harold helped organize the Hebrew curriculum, Susan became PTA co-ordinator and also held various positions on the board, including that of chair.

As a student, Harold was president of the Oxford University Jewish Society. Later, he became founding chair of the Medical and Scientific Committee for Soviet Jewry, 1971-76, and worked with the local Soviet Jewry Committee.

Active in campaigns in the UK and North America against Soviet abuses of psychiatry, he led the campaign to expel the Soviet Union from the World Psychiatry Association and also helped campaign for the release of Dr. Semyon Gluzman, who was held in Ukrainian prison and labor camps for speaking out against these abuses.

At UWO, he has been involved with the Canadian Professors for Peace in the Middle East and has worked with other Jewish faculty on issues of concern to Jewish students, such as scheduling conflicts with religious holidays, provision of kosher food service and assessing the academic credibility of speakers invited onto campus.

Since 1978, Harold has also been a board member of Beth Tefilah.

Susan is a life member of National Council of Jewish Women, serving as chair or co-chair of the Soviet Jewry Committee since 1985. She is also a life member of Hadassah-WIZO, where she has held numerous positions, from Youth Aliyah co-chair and public affairs chair to co-convenor of the 1989 regional conference and vice-president from 1990-92.

Other volunteer activities have included the JCC, Jewish National Fund, as well as the Women's Committee of Orchestra London, of which she was president from 1990 to 1992.

As well, this Assembly will mark the 75th anniversary of national Canadian Jewish Congress.

Panelists in the former will be Rabbi Mel Glazer of London; Prof. Michael Sobol of the University of Guelph; and Judi Cartman of Sudbury. Film helps to rehabilitate youth

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Who hasn't heard of Schindler's List, the fiercely gripping story of one man's actions to oppose the Nazis' murderous plans?

The film has packed movie houses across the country and has garnered rave reviews. Now you can add Rabbi Larry Lander to the list of those singing the praises of the film — not just for its artistic merit but for its power as an educational tool as well.

Lander is spiritual leader of Har Tikvah Synagogue in Brampton, a medium-sized congregation of 60 families. Late one night about two weeks ago, vandals daubed a side wall of the shul with anti-Semitic graffiti, including a swastika, the letters "KKK" and the letter "W" with a dot over it, symbol of white power.

Within one day, police had arrested two juveniles in connection with the incident. When they informed Rabbi Lander of the apprehension, he told them he wanted to meet with the youths and their parents.

In speaking with the parents prior to the meeting, Rabbi Lander asked that as "homework" the two youths should see the film, Schindler's List.

When he later met the boys, only one had seen it, but "he was profoundly moved by it."

"What ensued was a very good conversation between us," Rabbi Lander said. "I explained the symbolism of what had been written [on the shul] and about the Holocaust. I explained the pain [created] by this symbolism and how gut wrenching it is for survivors to see this."

Rabbi Lander said the boys were especially moved when he told them that his 4-year-old son had asked him, "Will they come hurt me?" when the child was told about the desecration.

"It bothered them that it would instil such fear in a little boy."

When he asked the youths why they had done it, "They said that at the schools they went to there is a lot of anti-Semitic and anti-Black talk and they thought they'd ingratiate themselves with their friends," Rabbi Lander said. "They thought it would be cool."

The boys, who police believe are not connected to any white supremacist organization, originally saw the symbols on an episode of the Geraldo show.

Rabbi Lander said he asked for the meeting with the boys because "we'd like to turn their ignorance around and salvage some good out of this."

Since their meeting, the boys have written a letter of apology to the congregation which was read during Purim. Although the boys still face criminal charges of mischief, Rabbi Lander said he has heard that "one of them has become a different person. He's helpful around the house, is more gentle and tolerant and the family is discussing more issues around the house."

Despite his apparent success in reaching through to the youths, Rabbi Lander said he is concerned by their statement that racist talk is common in the two Peel-area schools they attend. He said the community must tackle these issues head on, and he pointed out that even prior to the desecration, he had initiated a meeting of Muslims, Christians, Hindus and Jews to get teenagers together and create common bonds between them.

About 50 teens met one day recently "to talk, do skits and share religious services." Rabbi Lander hopes to widen the circle to include youths from the Black and Asian communities.

He has also called for creation of a provincial anti-racism institute, similar to Givat Haviva in Israel, to bring together youths and "to begin healing the rifts in the community."

Archeology course on offer at TAU

They include prehistoric excavations and field surveys, excavations in the biblical land of Geshur with emphasis on archaeological sites on the eastern shore of Lake Kinnereth and the western slopes of the Golan, and excavations at the biblical sites of Megiddo, Tel Jezreel and Tel Gerisa.

The research facilities include a pottery restoration workshop, archaeo-zoology and archaeo-botany laboratories, a photographic studio, a surveying department, the Archaeology Library, a slide archive and a rich collection of ancient pottery from major archaeological excavations.

Special program offered for youth visiting Israel

TORONTO — Four national Jewish organizations have joined forces to run an Israel summer program for Canadian Jewish Youth.

Youth To Youth — Israel Summer Experience (ISE) is open to all Canadian high school students who are seeking a different, more intense, first-hand encounter with Israel.

A unique feature of ISE is the Mifgashim (encounter) program. During Mifgashim, participants have the opportunity to build long lasting relationships at a week-long retreat, where Canadian and Israeli teens celebrate their shared background and diverse cultures.

Other highlights of ISE include Shabbat and volunteer work in a Project Renewal community and hands-on environmental activity with the Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel. In addition, participants tour the length and breadth of the land of Israel.

"An Israel experience, with all the deep emotional and intellectual impact it has at this impressionable age, goes a long way to strengthening a teenager's Jewish identity," noted Elizabeth Sokolsky, National Director of B'nai Brith Youth Organization (BBYO) Canada.

"Not only did I experience the thrill of touring around Israel, but I also had the chance to meet new friends, both Canadian and Israeli," remarked Daniel Perlin, 16, of Burlington, Ont., a previous ISE participant.

"I now have a whole new family from all across Canada," added Daniella Abramson, 17, of Vancouver.

Eli Rubenstein, director of Young Leadership Development for United Israel Appeal of Canada explains: "Anytime you send a teen to Israel you can look forward to a wonderful experience. What makes this program so special however, is the unbelievably close connections and relationships the Canadian teens form with their fellow Israeli teens. It is not an exaggeration to say that many of these friendships will last a lifetime."

ISE is jointly sponsored by BBYO Canada, United Israel Appeal of Canada, The Canadian Council of Jewish Community Centres and the Canadian Zionist Federation. The initiative was sparked by the CRB Foundation's national drive to bring more teens to Israel.

ISE will run from July 10 to August 8. The cost is $3,850 from all points in Canada and some scholarships are available for applicants in genuine financial need. For further information and/or ISE application forms please contact your local BBYO/JCC office or call Elizabeth Sokolsky at BBYO Canada, (416) 631-5724.

Mazon offers new project for Passover funding drive

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Mazon Canada has unveiled a new project for the Passover holiday that is geared to raising awareness of the problem of hunger — custom-printed placecards for the seder table.

The placecards contain both the guest's and the host family's name beneath an attractive design that incorporates Passover symbols like the wine cup and seder plate.

The placecards are another innovation designed to help Mazon raise money to help feed the hungry. Passover contributions are considered all the more timely in light of the Haggadah's injunction to "let all who are hungry come and eat. Let all who are in need come and celebrate Passover."

Funds raised through sales of the Passover placecards are pooled and later distributed to grassroots organizations that try to alleviate hunger among the needy.

Another project for the Passover holiday is the distribution of 20,000 cards to be used at seders as a reminder that "you can help us fulfil the mitzvah of feeding the hungry among us by donating just a small percentage of the cost of your family seder to Mazon." The cards are being distributed to families through congregations across the country.

Other Mazon fundraising initiatives include the sale of special occasion cards for simchas or to express sympathy as well as the use of nine colorful glass boxes that can be made available for synagogue functions and other social gatherings to help collect contributions for the organization.

Children living in poverty

Writing in Mazon's most recent newsletter, Mazon Canada chair Gordon Wolfe notes that "more than 1.2 million children under the age of 18 — almost one in five — live in poverty in Canada." Since 1989, the year Parliament resolved to end child poverty, more than 250,000 children have been added to the ranks of the poor, he writes.

In Metro Toronto alone, Wolfe continues, 142,000 children received socal assistance in 1993.

Regardless of political activities to aid those in need, there is "the absolute necessity for us to be personally involved in helping to relieve these problems," Wolfe states.

Mazon distributes funds to organizations across Canada twice a year. In its fall 1993 allocation, Mazon made grants of $70,000 to 46 organizations. Sixteen recipient groups were in Quebec, the others in the rest of Canada and one was abroad.

The single largest allocation of $4,000 went to the Jewish Community Centre of Bosnia-Herzegovina in Sarajevo. Domestic allocations of $3,500 went to B'nai Brith Women of Vancouver and to Tomchai Shabbos in Toronto.

Other recipient groups include the Albert County Action Committee in Riverview, N.B., Bikur Cholim Ladies Association of Montreal, the Colchester Food Bank Association of Truro, N.S., the Lethbridge Food Bank and Streetlink Centre in Toronto.

For more information or to order Passover place cards or simcha cards, contact Mazon Canada at 788 Marlee Ave., Suite 206, Toronto, Ont., M6B 3K1 or phone (416) 783-7554.

Temple rededicates Saskatchewan Ark

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For Shelley Saidman, the recent rededication of the Aron Kodesh from the old Melville Synagogue in memory of her parents Harry and Norma Swartz was "a little sad but felt like the right thing to do."

Saidman and her husband, Lee, were present at the ceremony last month in which Reform congregation Temple Shalom rededicated the Aron Kodesh it had been keeping in storage during renovations.

Lee said the transplanted Aron Kodesh symbolized the passing of the torch from one Jewish community to another struggling to grow. Melville, Sask., was once home to a thriving Jewish community. By the mid-1960s however, most of the Jewish families had left for Winnipeg or Vancouver.

Synagogue artifacts transferred

Shelley's parents lived in Melville. Her father was the last president of the synagogue, which dated back to 1919, and her mother was the last president of Melville's Hadassah-WIZO chapter.

When the Saidmans married in Israel in 1969, Harry Swartz brought the shul's Torah to Israel. Most of the syngogue's artifacts were transferred to the Beth Jacob Synagogue in Regina and Swartz bought the building. When he passed away, the family sold the building but kept the Aron Kodesh and some of the benches.

It was at the same time, in the early 1970s, that Winnipeg's only Reform congregation bought its present building in south Winnipeg. Shelley recalled the congregation using a portable aron. "Melville's Aron was a nice addition to the service," she said.

A few years ago, the congregation remodelled the santuary. The old Aron didn't fit in with the new look and was put in storage.

"It was never our intention to discard the old Aron," said Rabbi Jeffrey Gale, Temple Shalom's spiritual leader. "We had always planned to have a chapel for smaller services that would include the Aron. It just took us longer than we expected to set it up."

The Saidmans were invited by the rabbi to attend the rededication. "The service was a regular monthly Friday night choir service," Shelly said. "Rabbi Gale spoke about the Aron and the new chapel during his sermon. Lee and I were invited to come up for aliyahs during the Torah reading."

Temple Shalom does not hold Saturday services.

Rabbi Gale said the parshah of the week and the Haftorah were appropriate to the occasion in describing the giving of the Torah and the order of the temple service.

Singles discuss relationships at JCC/Aish Hatorah event

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Jewish singles got a chance to meet and talk to other singles about male/female relationships at a recent event sponsored by Aish Hatorah and the Jewish Community Centre (JCC).

Questions posed to about 100 single men and women between 30 and 45 seated around ten tables elicited lively discussions on such topics as the differences between men and women, what the opposite gender is looking for in a potential mate, and men and women being "just friends" after physical intimacy. A facilitator at each table served to keep the conversation going and to make sure each participant got a say.

The groups talked among themselves for two 20-minute sessions. After each of the sessions, Rabbi Mitch Mandel, the director of outreach for Aish HaTorah, led a general discussion that enabled participants to hear some of the conclusions other groups had reached. Then Rabbi Mandel referred to the Torah to give a brief perspective on topics discussed.

The monthly singles program, which has been run by Aish Hatorah for the past year and a half, recently joined forces with the JCC to present the evening's program at the JCC where the program will be held in the future.

Rabbi Mandel said the format of the program originated three years ago with the Aish Hatorah in Los Angeles. Singles, he said, would like to meet somebody appropriate and are interested in discussing issues that are vital to them. "They are also meeting other singles [in a situation] that doesn't cause any 'uncomfortability.' "

He added that in any given week 1,500 to 1,800 singles across North America take part in the Aish Hatorah program. It operates in Cleveland, Miami, Washington, Los Angeles and Toronto.

Commenting on the strong reaction to the subject of the differences between men and women, Gail, speaking to a small group at the recent Toronto event, pointed to feminists. They want "to be on the same level as men," said Gail.

A male participant told everyone in the room that the traditional roles of men and women are breaking down and men are unsure of what they are supposed to do in a relationship.

Also speaking to the entire group, a female participant said that women are more emotional than men and that women are better communicators. "[We] just have to accept the differences," she urged, adding that there wouldn't be much fun in having a relationship with someone who is exactly like you.

Rabbi Mandel said the question of differences between men and women annoy people because the world is defined by a male standard. From a Torah perspective, he says, there is no one standard. "Each person has their unique standard."

He compared the differences between men and women to a rainbow of contrasting colors. "You can only create beauty through contrasts."

When Rabbi Mandel asked the women present what primary quality they wanted in a male, the responses he got included trust, money, commitment, sense of humor and a strong value system.

Roman said to a small group at a table that too many women are focused on finding mates with professions, to the exclusion of seeking relationships they could grow in.

Walter told the people at the same table that he wanted loyalty from a woman. He complained that many women he knows date several guys at the same time and some are not honest about their dating activities.

John (not his real name) said he wanted an intelligent mate he could carry on a conversation with.

On the subject of men and women being "just friends" after physical intimacy, Joss said how friendship works out depends on whether sex is seen as a sport or as something meaningful.

Roman thought that one party would inevitably get hurt if two people wanted to be "just friends" after physical intimacy.

The next singles event will be at the JCC on March 20. For information, call Rosanne at 631-5658.

Survivor recalls onset of Holocaust in Hungary

Fiftieth anniversary to be marked on Yom Hashoah

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — By late 1943 and into early 1944, the government of Hungary could see the handwriting on the wall. Soviet forces were closing in and the opening of a Western front seemed imminent. In a bid to extricate Hungary from the war, the government opened secret negotiations with the Allies.

Up to that point, the situation facing Hungarian Jewry had been perilous, and thousands had been killed, but the majority had managed to avoid the destruction that had claimed so many of their brethren in the rest of Europe.

With Hungarian machinations jeopardizing their plan for the destruction of Hungary's Jews, German forces entered Hungary on March 19, 1944 and SS officer Adolph Eichmann was ordered to put into effect the "final solution of the Jewish question."

The 50th anniversary of the destruction of Hungary's Jews will be marked in Toronto on Yom Hashoah, April 10, during a community commemoration that is sponsored by the Holocaust remembrance committee of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

George Salamon, a survivor who grew up in Budapest, will deliver a short address as part of the annual services in memory of the Shoah's victims.

The speech will pay tribute to the Hungarian Jews who fell victim to the Nazis and to those who helped save them, he said.

From May 15, 1944, when the first deportations began, to the war's end on May 7, 1945, an estimated 600,000 Jews — 10 percent of the Holocaust death toll — were murdered by the Nazis and their Hungarian collaborators.

The Nazi plan for the Jews' destruction was methodical. Within four months of the German occupation, virtually all the Jews living outside Budapest had been deported, mostly to Auschwitz, Salamon said.

The Hungarian Holocaust Victims and Heroes Memorial is the first government-sponsored Holocaust memorial in Eastern Europe, and the first to be built on the site of Holocaust atrocities. It is near the Dohany Synagogue on a plaza that marks the site of a mass grave where 600,000 victims of the Budapest Ghetto are buried. [RNS Photo]

Readers of The CJN will recall the horrific testimony of survivors from the southern Hungarian city of Szeged, who told a Toronto court in the case of former gendarmerie captain Imre Finta about their ghettoization, brutal treatment and deportation — some to Auschwitz, others to forced labor in Austria. (Finta was acquitted of war crimes charges. The case is now under appeal.)

By late June, the Jews of Budapest and men inducted into forced labor units were virtually the only Hungarian Jews left alive.

In June, Hungary's Interior Ministry issued orders concentrating Budapest's Jews in a ghetto but by July 8, the effect of unfavorable press coverage and interventions by the king of Sweden, the Vatican and the Red Cross, coupled with the desire of the Hungarian government to negotiate an armistice with the Allies, brought a halt to further deportations.

But on Oct. 15, the German-backed Arrow Cross fascists seized the government and resumed the deportations. They also ordered forced marches of Jews towards Austria. It is estimated that from the Arrow Cross seizure of power until Soviet forces entered Budapest on Jan. 18, 1945, 98,000 Jews were killed.

Salamon picks up the story as of November when he, his mother, sister and five others went into hiding to evade an Arrow Cross roundup. Two Hungarian workmen spotted the group in a storage room in the building where they used to live near Margaret Island and the Arrow Cross came shortly afterwards to arrest them. They were taken to Arrow Cross headquarters on Andrassy Street where all the men, including Salamon, who was only 14, were beaten during an "interrogation."

"The guy pointed to his nose and asked me if he had a Jewish nose," Salamon recalled. "I said 'no,' and he began hitting me, saying, 'how dare you say no to me.'

"Then he repeated the question. I changed my answer to 'Sir, you have an Aryan nose.' The beating was on again, [with him] demanding a straight answer. This went on. . . After a while I could not stand it any longer and blurted out that 'you have a Jewish nose.' This helped, this is what he wanted to hear to justify his further action. After an outburst of anger and savage beating, the ordeal was over. . . Following the beating the left side of my face was black and blue, including my ear and the skin behind my ear. Perhaps this contributed to the total loss of hearing on that side."

Two other, older Jews were beaten even more severely, Salamon recalls. After being kept in a dark cell for two days or so, he was taken to a brick factory in the Buda section of the city, near the highway to Vienna. Salamon, his mother and sister were eventually released from the factory thanks to special diplomatic passes, called Schutz Passes, issued by the Swiss government. Salamon credits the Halutz Resistance, a Zionist movement, for forging many of the life-giving documents.

In addition, many Jews at that time were placed under the protection of neutral states like Sweden, Switzerland and Portugal. It was during this period that Swedish diplomat Raoul Wallenberg helped save thousands of Jews.

Salamon pointed out that in Hungary, the Christian-Jewish Society, with the support of nine Christian denominations, is petitioning the government to declare April 17 a national remembrance day to commemorate the tragedy of Hungarian Jewry.

Geneticist Breitman helped train scientists

TORONTO — Genetic researcher Dr. Martin Breitman died last month of cancer. He was 41.

Born and raised in Sarnia, Ont., he received his bachelor and master's degrees from McMaster University before completing his doctorate in tumor virology at the University of Southern California in 1980.

After doing post-doctoral studies at the Hospital for Sick Children in Toronto, Breitman was appointed a senior scientist at the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute of Mount Sinai Hospital in 1985. There he worked in the cancer research and molecular and developmental biology divisions.

Breitman helped explain the development of eye lenses and cardiovascular and endothelial cells. He was to have officially received the $100,000 Alcon Research Institute award this March for his work on eye research.

He also trained many graduate students and post-doctoral fellows who have gone on to faculty positions in Canada and Europe.

With his trainees and scientific collaborators, Breitman published over 75 scientific articles on tumor virology, somatic cell genetics, lens development, genetic ablation and gene regulation.

He served on advisory committees for the Medical Research Council of Canada, the Human Frontier Program in Strasbourg, France, and the Israel Cancer Research Fund.

Breitman is survived by his wife, Jo Ann Breitman, children Stephanie and Alison, parents Hazel and Leo and many relatives. A research fund in his name has been established at Mount Sinai Hospital.

Matt Ages was a loyal friend

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — Ottawa native Matt Ages was remembered at his funeral a few weeks ago as a loyal friend, who for 50 years kept in touch with friends from his World War II Air Force crew. Ages, brother of The Canadian Jewish News columnist Arnold Ages, died suddenly from heart failure while on vacation in Florida on Jan. 11. He was 74.

Ages was an athletic man throughout his life. If it hadn't been for the war he probably would have had a career in sports, said his wife Esther. He was a talented hockey player and gifted softball pitcher who played for government, Royal Canadian Air Force and Jewish men's league teams. In 1988 he was inducted into the Ottawa Jewish Hall of Fame for his contribution to the RCAF Senior Hockey League and a governmenrt basketball team. He was also known as a passionate and excellent golfer.

Ages was sent overseas in 1942, two years after he and Esther, his high school sweetheart, were married. For three years he flew missions out of England as a pilot with RCAF Bison Squadron 429. After the war Ages kept up a steady correspondence with crew members who had settled as far away as England and Seattle.

War veteran

"To this day I'm still getting calls and letters from his friends," said Esther. "Obviously he did some wonderful things."

Ages spent 30 years working as a customs appraiser for the Canadian government. At age 50, he decided to start his own business, representing other businesses before customs tribunals to win them more favorable duty rates on imports. He retired last year.

In 1991 Ages became a member of a committee that established the Ottawa Post of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada. Chapters had been established in several other Canadian cities more than 20 years earlier, but local veterans didn't believe there would be much interest in this city, said former Ottawa Post Commander Mat Levitin. To their surprise, 120 men joined the group. Ages was the deputy commander of the Ottawa Post for two years and would have become the commander had it not been for his poor health, said Levitin.

Ages is survived by his wife Esther, two children, five grandchildren, brothers Sam and Arnold and a sister, Miriam.

Women try to overcome stereotypes affecting Jews, Poles

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — They have much in common. Both have roots in Poland and were born in 1940. Canada is their adopted home. The two women raised their children here.

But Tecia Werbowski is Jewish and Irene Tomaszewski is Christian. They are both acutely aware that the friendship that has developed between them is regarded by some as almost an act of treason. The two women have been drawn together by a desire to overcome the stereotypes that prevail in their respective communities about the other, to bring some balance to the history of Poles and Jews, and perhaps contribute to a more empathetic future.

They are doing research and plan to publish a book on Christian Poles who helped Jews escape Nazi oppression during World War II at the risk of their lives, either individually or through the underground or the Zegota, the clandestine Council for Aid to Jews. The latter was recognized by Yad Vashem, as have about 4,000 individual Poles who sheltered or saved Jews.

They are combing through original documentation, and interviewing rescuers and those rescued now living in Canada.

Tomaszewski first briefly met Werbowski just over a year ago at the launch of the latter's book of semi-autobiographical short stories entitled Zina at the Polish Consulate.

The book was named for Werbowski's mother, who survived the war by assuming the guise of a French governess in the home of a wealthy Polish family. Her father was in the underground.

For safety, the 1-year-old Tecia was taken in by another Christian family, where she remained for several years. Her brother and the family hiding him were killed after they were denounced to the Nazis.

Werbowski emigrated to Montreal in 1968, with her mother and young son after the Communist government launched a vicious anti-Zionist campaign.

Tomaszewski was born in northern Russia after her family, which lived in eastern Poland was deported, after the Russian occupation. Other relatives were forced laborers for the Germans, and an uncle was executed. They were then sent to a colony for displaced Poles in the African country of Tanganyika, and later moved to England. She has lived in Montreal since 1950.

Unknown to each other, both had been trying to foster a dialogue between Poles and Jews. Werbowski is a board member of the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation, a group that meets usually in informal settings for frank discussion of the two people's relations.

Tomaszewski, a journalist, wrote an article for the Toronto Star about the role of the Polish underground in the Warsaw Ghetto. Unlike Werbowski, she had not until recently given much thought to Polish-Jewish relations. "Being anti-Jewish was just not in the consciousness of our family."

But she could not fail to notice to her dismay, with the growing interest in the Holocaust, that too often being Polish was equated with being anti-Semitic.

She cannot accept the image of all Poles as bystanders to atrocities against Jews, or worse, actively encouraging it.

After the Star article, Werbowski — who had forgotten Tomaszewski from the book launch — invited her to coffee. She felt the Heritage Foundation needed more Polish participants.

Both women chuckle when Werbowski relates how disappointed she was when she saw Tomaszewski sitting in the restaurant. "I wanted to speak to a Christian Pole. By her looks, I thought she was Jewish... In fact, a lot of people think she's Jewish and I'm Polish."

"We had an instant sense of affinity. We talked as if you had been friends a long time," Tomaszewski recalled.

They are concerned that so many Canadians seem to be unaware of the basic facts that Poland was occupied by the Germans and that the concentration camps were set up and run by the Germans, and that three million Polish Christians also died there.

Werbowski said she finds Canadian-born Jews more resistant to the idea of Jews and Poles coming together in dialogue than those from Poland.

She knows first-hand that there are anti-Semities in Poland and that such feeling was fanned by the former communist regime. "But I feel the Polish people in general should not be branded as anti-Semites. I owe my life to a Polish family.

"At some point, the two solitudes have to meet and end the animosity."

PASSOVER FOOD

Organize and plan your post-Shabbat seder

By LESLYE MICHLIN BORDEN
Special to The CJN

This year, Passover begins on Saturday evening, March 26. This poses special problems for preparing the traditional seder feast, since all the food has to be ready before the Sabbath begins on Friday at sundown.

The confluence of Shabbat and Passover does make it more difficult to come up with an appropriately fancy feast, but not impossible. Careful planning and good organization will get your feast on the table in a timely and attractive manner.

MASHED POTATO MATZOH BALLS (KNAIDLACH) WITH SOULS (NESHOMES)

3 eggs
1 cup mashed potatoes
1 tsp. salt
3 tbsp. pareve Passover margarine, melted
3 tbsp. chicken stock (or water the potatoes cooked in)
1 cup matzo meal
Neshomes

In a medium mixing bowl, beat the eggs. Add the mashed potatoes, salt, and margarine. Mix thoroughly, adding warm liquid as necessary to smooth out the mixture. Stir in the matzoh meal. Cover and refrigerate.

About 45 minutes before serving, remove the batter from the refrigerator. Bring a large pot of salted water to the boil. Moisten your hands with cold water. Shape into balls. Stuff each one with a teaspoon of the cooked liver mixture. When all the batter is shaped, drop the balls into the boiling water. Cook, covered, 30 minutes (or longer for fluffier matzoh balls). Drain and serve in chicken soup.

Makes 12 matzoh balls.

NESHOMES

3 tbsp. oil
Livers from 6 Cornish hens
1 half onion, finely chopped
Salt to taste

In a small fry pan, heat the oil. Add the livers and onions. Season with salt. Cook until the livers are done and the onions are tender. Remove from heat. Chop or mash. Cover and refrigerate until time to stuff in the centre of matzo balls as directed above.

FISH AND VEGETABLE TERRINE

1½ cups sliced carrots
1 clove garlic
2 cups broccoli or spinach
1 clove garlic
4 large red peppers, roasted, with skin and seeds removed, cut into slices
2½ lbs. firm fleshed white meat fish, such as sea bass or halibut
1 large onion, chopped
2 eggs
¼ cup matzoh meal
1 tsp. salt, or to taste
½ tsp. white pepper
Boiling water
12 large lettuce leaves
Horseradish sauce

Oil a 2-quart casserole. Line the bottom and sides with waxed paper and oil again. Set aside.

Prepare vegetables. Place carrots in saucepan with whole garlic clove, water to cover, and ½ tsp. salt. Cook, covered, until carrots are almost tender. Drain thoroughly. Discard the garlic. Chop coarsely. Set aside.

Place broccoli (or spinach) in a saucepan with whole garlic clove, water to cover, and ½ teaspoon salt. Cook until tender, but not mushy. Drain thoroughly. Chop coarsely. Set aside.

Place the fish, onion, and eggs in food processor or blender. Do in parts if your bowl isn't big enough to hold all the ingredients. Process, pouring a little water through the feed tube if necessary to smooth out the mixture. Place in a mixing bowl and combine with the matzoh meal, salt, and pepper.

Heat oven to 350 degrees.

Layer ⅓ of the fish mixture into the prepared pan. Cover with the carrots and then slices of half the peppers. Layer in another ⅓ of the fish. Cover with slices of the remaining peppers and then the cooked broccoli or spinach. Layer in the last ⅓ of the fish.

Place the pan into another larger pan. Place in the oven. Pour boiling water into the bottom (outer) pan. Bake 45 minutes, or until the fish feels firm when you press it in the middle. Remove from the water. Cool. Then cover and refrigerate.

To serve, run a knife around the edge of the pan. Invert onto a platter. Peel off the waxed paper. Cut into wedges. Place each wedge on a lettuce lined plate. Pass the horseradish sauce.

Makes 12 servings.

HORSERADISH SAUCE

2 cups Passover mayonnaise
6 tbsp. white horseradish (or more)
2 tsp. fresh lemon juice, or to taste
½ tsp. salt
½ tsp paprika

Combine all ingredients in a small bowl. Refrigerate until ready to use.

Makes 2½ cups.

CORNISH HENS WITH YAM AND MATZOH STUFFING

6 Cornish hens, split
Salt, pepper, garlic powder, paprika to taste
1 large onion, chopped
2-3 cloves of garlic, chopped
Vegetable oil
1 cup celery, chopped
1 cup carrot, chopped
4 cups mashed cooked yams
1 cup pitted prunes, coarsely chopped
½ cup dried apricots, coarsely chopped
4 cups broken up matzoh or matzoh farfel

Fish makes for a nice, light change

After the heavy seder and yontif meals, fish is a nice change.

FRESH TROUT WRAPS (Foodland Ontario)

Trout is available year-round. Enjoy this wonderful combination of trout, tomatoes and cucumbers in a fast and easy recipe.

4 trout, filleted and skinned (each about 4 oz./125 g)
½ tsp. each salt and pepper
4 wooden toothpicks

Vegetable Stuffing

½ cup coarsely chopped cucumber
½ cup coarsely chopped tomato
¼ cup matzah meal
2 tbsp. finely chopped onion
1 tbsp. chopped fresh dill weed (or 1 tsp. dried)
2 tsp. lemon juice

In a small mixing bowl, combine stuffing ingredients. Pat fillets dry. Sprinkle with salt and pepper. Divide stuffing among 4 fillets, roll up and secure with a toothpick. Butter a small baking dish and place fillets showing the filling side up.l Bake, uncovered, at 400 F (200 C) for 25 min. Serve warm, or cold with yogurt and fresh cucumber slices. Makes 4 servings.

To microwave: Prepare and stuff fish as instructed above. Cover fish with vented plastic wrap. Cook on high 4 to 5 min. Let stand, covered, 5 min. to complete cooking.

ONE PAN HALIBUT WITH MUSHROOM COATING

(Presented at the Second Annual Consumers Gas Great Canadian Chefs Cooking Competition)

2 cups button mushrooms
¼ cup off dry white Passover wine (Riesling, if possible)
1 shallot, finely diced
1 medium sweet potato
2 5 oz. (160 g) halibut fillets
Salt and freshly ground pepper
1 egg, beaten
3 tbsp. canola oil
10 trimmed stalks asparagus

Sauce:

½ cup dry white wine (Riesling, if possible)
1 tbsp. lemon juice
¼ cup cold butter or pareve Passover margarine
3 tbsp. chives

Preheat oven to 400 F.

Prepare mushroom coating. Process mushrooms in food processor until a coarse paste. Spread thinly onto baking sheet. Mix together wine and shallot and pour over mushroom mixture. Place tray in oven until most of moisture has evaporated, about 20 minutes.

At same time, place sweet potato in oven for 15 minutes. Peel sweet potato and slice diagonally into 6 slices.

Season halibut with salt and pepper. Coat with beaten egg. Coat evenly with mushroom paste on both sides. Reserve.

Place a large skillet on medium heat. Add oil. Fry sweet potato slices until golden on both sides, about 3 minutes per side. Add asparagus, saute one minute, season vegetables and reserve leaving oil in pan.

Return pan to stove and add halibut fillets. Cook for 2 minutes to brown coating on underside. Return vegetables to skillet. Place in oven for 6 minutes or until halibut is cooked and vegetables are tender. Remove fillets and transfer to dinner plates along with vegetables. Keep warm.

Discard any oil in skillet and on high heat add wine and lemon juice. Reduce to syrupy consistency. Reduce heat to low. Whisk in butter and chives.

To serve, arrange vegetables nicely on plate, place on fish and spoon on sauce.

Recipes reduce fat levels, but retain good taste

Most Passover celebrations include main courses that are laden with fat and cholesterol. Katja Goldman, Empire's official chef and recipe developer, has created recipes that reduce fat and cholesterol levels but maintain their good taste.

ROAST CHICKEN WITH FENNEL AND TOMATOES
Serves 8

2 chickens, cut in eighths, skin removed
6 cloves garlic, crushed
2 tbsp. Passover olive oil
1 tsp. crushed fennel seeds
½ cup fresh squeezed lemon juice
4 bay leaves
Salt and pepper to taste
4 fresh fennel bulbs (remove fronds, set aside), cut in eighths
2 large onions, peeled, sliced very thin
16 fresh tomatoes, quartered or 16 whole canned tomatoes, drained
4 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley
1 cup kosher chicken broth
2 more tbsp. parsley to garnish

In a large bowl, combine all of the ingredients. Marinate overnight.

One hour before you begin to cook, remove the marinating chicken and vegetables from the refrigerator and bring to room temperature.

Preheat oven to 375 F. Place chicken and vegetables in a single layer into large 2 inch deep roasting pan (an oven-to-table dish works well).

Place in oven and roast 45 minutes. Garnish with additional parsley and serve.

MATZAH SPINACH KUGEL
Makes one 9-inch round kugel

2 10-oz. boxes of frozen chopped spinach, defrosted
2 cups chopped leeks (white part only) or chopped onions
1 tbsp. Passover vegetable oil
6 egg whites
2 whole eggs
1 tbsp. chopped parsley
1 tbsp. chopped dill
4 cups kosher for Passover matzah farfel
Salt and pepper to taste
Pinch of nutmeg
Vegetable oil spray for pan
1 tbsp. matzah meal

Preheat oven to 350 F.

Drain spinach in a colander; squeeze out any extra water and set aside in a large bowl.

In a skillet, saute the leeks or onions in oil until soft. Remove from heat and add to drained spinach.

In the work bowl of a food processor fitted with a metal blade, chop the herbs, add the 2 whole eggs, salt, pepper and nutmeg. Process for 2 minutes. Scrape down sides, pulse chop until greens are specks. Pour into the spinach mixture.

Mix in matzah farfel. Beat egg whites, fold into mixture. Spray pan with oil, dust lightly with matzah meal. Pour mixture into pan and bake at 350 F for 45 minutes.

Cut into wedges and serve.

PUREED CARROTS AND CELERY ROOT
Serves 6

2 lbs. carrots, peeled and sliced
1 lb. celery root, peeled and cut into cubes
6 sprigs parsley tied with string
2 pears (or apples), peeled and cut into large pieces
Juice of 1 lemon
3 cups kosher chicken broth
Nutmeg, salt and pepper to taste

(Note: Squeeze lemon juice in bowl of cold water. As you cut up pear and celery root, place in the water to retard oxidation (browning).)

Drain celery root and pears, discard water. Place pieces in a large saucepan and add the carrots. Cover with broth and bring to a boil. Reduce heat, simmer until carrots are very tender. Drain, reserving ½ cup of liquid. Transfer mixture to food processor in small batches and puree until smooth. Add broth as needed. Add nutmeg, salt and pepper to taste. At this point, the puree can be refrigerated for a day.

To serve, heat in saucepan over low heat for 3-5 minutes OR transfer puree to a baking dish, cover with lid or foil and bake in preheated 350 F oven for 20-30 minutes until steaming hot.

CHICKEN BREASTS WITH MUSHROOMS
Serves 4-6

3 boneless, skinless chicken breasts, split
¾ cup matzah meal
½ tsp. dried thyme leaves
Salt and pepper to taste
2 egg whites
Vegetable oil spray
2 tsp. Passover olive oil
1 large onion, finely chopped
3 cloves garlic, minced
2 lbs. mushrooms, thinly sliced
½ cup kosher-for-Passover sherry
¼ cup kosher chicken stock
Juice of 1 large orange
½ tsp. paprika
2 tbsp. chopped Italian parsley
Fresh ground pepper
Parsley to garnish

In a blender (or food processor fitted with a metal blade), pulse/chop the matzah meal, thyme, salt and pepper until meal is "powdery." Place in a shallow dish, set aside.

In another shallow bowl, whisk egg whites until light in color. Dip chicken breast pieces in egg whites, then dredge in matzah meal. Place in lightly oiled baking dish (9 x 12); lightly spray one side of breasts with oil and place in 400 F oven for 3 minutes. Remove from oven and turn oven down to 350 F.

In a large skillet, saute garlic and onions in olive until the onions are translucent. Add mushrooms and saute for 3 minutes. With a slotted spoon, remove mushrooms and spoon over breasts. With remainin juices still in the skillet, return the skillet to the flame, pour in sherry, stock, orange juice and paprika. Simmer for 3-5 minutes. Stir in parsley, pour over mushrooms and chicken.

Cover and bake for 45 minutes. Garnish with more parsley and serve.

DILLY DUMPLINGS
Serves 6-8

½ cup grated onion
1½ cups matzah meal
¼ cup vegetable oil
½ cup kosher chicken broth
Salt and pepper to taste (½-1 tsp.)
1/8 tsp. ground ginger
2 large eggs
2 egg whites
3 tbsp. chopped fresh dill

In a large bowl, whisk together oil, broth, eggs and egg whites, salt, pepper and ginger. Stir in grated onion, dill and matzah meal. Cover. Refrigerate overnight or for a few hours.

Bring a 10-quart pot of water to a boil. Add salt if desired. Spoon mixture onto a large flat plate. Holding the plate in one hand and a blunt knife in the other, cut teaspoon size pieces of dough into the water.

Simmer for 20 minutes. Remove with a slotted spoon. Serve as a side dish with the chicken.

The Kosher Information Service of the Kashruth Council of Toronto, affiliated with the Vaad Harabonim of Toronto, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and the Canadian Jewish Congress, publishes a COR holiday information and recipe pamphlet for each major holiday.

Cynthia Gasner, the director of information and public relations, coordinates the information programs of the Rabbinical Vaad Hakashruth. Rabbi Yitzchok Kerzner is the chair of the Vaad and Yitz'hak Feldman is the chair of the Kashruth Council.

As a service to the community, the Kashruth Council provides kashrut and food-related information to thousands of families across Canada and the United States, and as far as Israel and Europe, says Rabbi Mordechai Levin, the council's executive director.

Esther Schwartz, the council's kosher food consultant, prepares and tests the recipes. The recipes for Passover 1994-5754 include: tasty vegetable soup, stuffed zucchini, surprise meat loaf, green salad with toasted farfel and Passover nut diamond cake.

New additions to the menu

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Most people think that Pesach is a celebration of our release from Egyptian bondage and deliverance into Israel. I prefer to think of it as the time of the great debate. Do I serve floaters or sinkers with the chicken soup? I grew up with sinkers and my husband was raised with floaters. We have great discussions every year about which matzah ball is the best matzah ball. (I'm right, of course).

I would never presume to tell anyone what to cook for seder. Every family has traditional specialties they serve and woe to the person who tries to tamper with them. Last year I suggested, just suggested mind you, that we try a wonderful new glazed sweet potato recipe I had found. I wanted to skip the boring sweet potato and pineapple casserole that's been served every year since Moses told Ziporah to throw a few things together and get a move on.

Saying that I got a negative reaction is like saying Pharaoh got a little wet. I relented and kept the menu pretty much the same as its always been. I did, however, promise myself that this year I would make a few additions to the menu. It's a little extra work but after chopping 35 onions and peeling 4,000 eggs what's a few extra. Hopefully these recipes will become part of our seder tradition and I can kiss my potato kugel good bye.

AMBROSIA MEDLEY

2 cups fresh pineapple cubes
2 bananas, sliced
2 cups fresh strawberries, sliced
4 tbsp. sugar
1 cup coconut
½ cup orange juice

Layer half of pineapple, banana and strawberries in a medium serving dish or dessert dishes. Sprinkle with 1 tbsp. of the sugar and 2 tbsp. of the coconut. Repeat layers. Top with remaining coconut. Slowly pour orange juice over fruit. Chill until serving time. Serves 10. This can be doubled or tripled.

POTATOES AND LEEKS

2 lbs. new potatoes, quartered
8 leeks, washed, trimmed, diagonally sliced
2 garlic cloves, crushed
2 tbsp. oil
4 tsp. chopped fresh tarragon
2 tsp. grated lemon peel
1 tsp. salt

In a large sauce pan, combine potatoes, leeks and garlic. Cover with water, add the salt and cook 12 to 17 minutes or until potatoes are fork tender. Drain. Pour oil over hot vegetables and sprinkle with tarragon and lemon peel. Toss gently and serve warm or cold. Season with salt and pepper if desired. Garnish with fresh tarragon or lemon. Serves 8 to 10.

VEGETABLE KUGEL

1 cup grated raw apple
1 cup grated raw sweet potato
1 cup grated raw carrot
1 cup matzah cake meal
1 scant cup Passover margarine
1 tsp. salt
1 tsp. Passover baking soda
1 tsp. cinnamon
1 tsp. nutmeg
¾ cup sugar

Preheat oven to 325. Grease 10 inch casserole. Mix all the ingredients together well. Pour into the baking dish. Cover with aluminum foil and bake 45 min. Raise oven to 350, remove cover and bake an additional 15 min. Slice and eat hot. Serves 6 to 8.

BROCCOLI AND ORANGE SALAD

1 bunch broccoli, cut into florets
3 to 4 navel oranges, peeled and sliced
1 small red onion, thinly sliced
1 head romaine lettuce, washed, dried and torn
3 tbsp. lemon juice
¼ cup oil
2 tsp. sugar

Salt and pepper to taste

Steam broccoli until just tender. Drain and cool in ice water. Drain and toss the broccoli, orange slices, onion slices and lettuce in a large bowl. Combine remaining ingredients together in a covered container and mix well. Pour over salad and serve. This can be prepared the day before and add the dressing just before serving. Serves 6 to 8.

Hints prove helpful in kashering kitchen

While the thought of kashering the kitchen for Pesach seems overwhelming, it is not really so daunting if you approach it step by step.

The rules given here are general; when in any doubt, call your rabbi.

Any surface used only for cold chometz, like refrigerator or pantry shelves, needs only a thorough washing and rinsing. Cover the pantry shelves with shelf paper.

Surfaces used for hot chometz, such as countertops, highchairs, and stovetops, must also be covered with a non-absorbent material, such as a contact paper, oil cloth, aluminum foil, or, if you are lucky enough to have one, a pre-cut, storable cover.

An electrical range should be turned on long enough to heat the element to a red-hot glow; a gas or electric oven set on broil and allowed to heat for one hour.

Self-cleaning ovens should be set to the cleaning cycle so that cleaning and kashering will be done automatically.

Microwave ovens can be kashered easily for Pesach. Clean the oven well. Fill with water a clean container that was not used for 24 hours. Place in microwave and turn it on to full power, letting it steam heavily. Turn it off and wipe out the inside.

To use the microwave during Pesach, use a new glass or microwave-safe turntable, or a piece of styrofoam or thick cardboard as a separation between the bottom of the oven and the cooking dish. Make sure the food is well covered.

Kasher a stainless steel sink by pouring boiling water over the entire surface (including the taps) after it has sat unused for 24 hours.

Table linens and towels need only be washed normally. Mixers, and the motors of food processors and blenders can be used, but ask a rabbi for precise instructions as to kashering them.

Using up chometz a real challenge

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Using up the last of the chometz is always a challenge. We always seem to give or throw away enough stuff to feed a small third world country. I decided to start saving recipes that would help me use the stuff I usually sell. I hope that the following recipes make life a little easier and that your cleaning is followed by a big nap.

BUTTERY BREAD AND BERRY PUDDING

8 slices bread
⅓ cup butter or margarine
1 qt. blueberries, raspberries or blackberries
1 cup sugar
Pinch of cinnamon and mace mixed in sugar

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 9x9 baking pan. Butter slices of bread on one side and arrange 4 slices, buttered side up in the baking pan. Dump half the berries on top, sprinkle with half the sugar mixture, then mash well with the potato masher so that the juice runs down into the bread. Top with the remaining bread, buttered side up, then the remaining berries and sugar. Mash once again.

Bake uncovered for 35 min. and remove from oven. Mash again and bake an additional 10 minutes or until the juices are bubbly and syrupy. Cool for 30 min. before serving. Great with ice cream, whipped cream or sour cream. Serves 6.

HOT DOGS AND RICE CASSEROLE

¼ cup each chopped green pepper, onion, celery
1 tsp. minced garlic
2 tbsp. margarine
1 cup (8¼ oz.) whole peeled tomatoes
1¼ cup water
½ cup uncooked rice
¼ cup plus 1 tbsp. tomatoe paste
½ tsp. Worcestershire sauce
½ tsp hot sauce (optional)
8 kosher hot dogs, sliced

In a medium saucepan, cook green pepper, onion, celery and garlic in margarine until tender, approx. 5 min. Stir in remaining ingredients except hot dogs. Cover and simmer, stirring occasionally for 20 min. or until rice is cooked. Stir in hot dogs and heat throughout. Serves 6.

Pomegranates food of myth; also make for great eating

Jerusalem Dateline

Few fruits have as many myths associated with them as pomegranates. The ancient Greeks, for example, believe that the pomegranate was given to them by Zeus as a reward for their devotion to him, and many Arabs and Bedouins believed that the tree had power over evil spirits. It was a tree under which one could sleep in safety and security. Perhaps the most charming of all myths is the one that holds that in each pomegranate fruit, one seed has come down from paradise. Even today, many Christian and Jewish mystics believe that the pomegranate tree is the Tree of Life.

Mentioned in the Bible as one of the five fruit trees indigenous to the Holy Land, the pomegranate has served as a source of artistic inspiration for many centuries. The golden bells that ornamented the Holy Temple in Jerusalem were shaped like pomegranates and their design often appears on mosaic floors, carved in stone on friezes, and on ancient coins. In early Christian art, the appearance of the pomegranate symbolized eternal life, and a fine example of this is seen in Bethlehem on the floor of the cave of the Church of the Nativity.

Modern-day Israelis still consider red pomegranate one of the most luxurious, delicious and beautiful of fruits. In Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, street vendors with old-fashioned juice squeezers still cut pomegranates in half and squeeze out their refreshing juice.

To remove the seeds from a whole pomegranate, simply cut the fruit in half and scoop out the seeds with a spoon, discarding the bitter white pith. Whether eaten plain, sprinkled on salads, or added to a vinaigrette dressing, they make marvelous treats. They also make excellent additions to humous or tahina. To try them in the Arabic fashion, sprinkle the seeds with rose-water, lemon juice and sugar. Chill the mixture well and then serve in a bowl that sits on crushed ice, giving each guest a demitasse spoon so that they may help themselves directly from the bowl.

Pomegranate seeds are also used to make grenadine, a non-alcoholic, sweet syrup used in various cocktails. A delightful homemade version of grenadine can be made by juicing six pomegranates, boiling the juice for 5-6 minutes and, if desired, adding sugar to taste and simmering for 3-4 minutes longer. The resulting syrup can be stored for up to 2 months if placed in sterile glass jars and refrigerated.

Unless otherwise noted, each of the following recipes is designed to serve 4-6.

CHICKEN IN POMEGRANATE SAUCE

1 large chicken, quartered
3 tbsp. olive oil
1 onion, chopped
9 oz. coarsely chopped walnuts
4-6 pomegranates
The juice of 2 lemons
1 tbsp. sugar
Salt and pepper to taste

In a large heavy skillet brown the chicken pieces quickly in hot oil. With a slotted spoon, remove the chicken and in the same skillet saute the onion until nicely browned. Add the walnuts and continue to saute over a low flame for 2-3 minutes longer.

Cut the pomegranates in half, scoop out the seeds and discard the pith. Place the seeds in a blender and blend for 3-4 seconds, and then strain the juice into a bowl, pressing to squeeze out the juice. (This should yield about 1 cup of juice.)

Pour the juice into the skillet, add the lemon juice, sugar, ⅔ cup of water, and salt and pepper to taste. Bring to a bare simmer, stir, return the chicken pieces to the skillet and cook uncovered until the chicken is very tender (45 minutes - 1 hour). Taste and correct the seasoning with more lemon or sugar to taste. If the sauce is too thick, thin with a little water. Serve piping hot.

POMEGRANATE ICES

1 cup sugar
1 cup pomegranate seeds, lightly crushed
6 tbsp. lemon juice
Mint leaves for garnish

To a saucepan with 4 cups of water add the sugar and boil for 5-6 minutes, stirring regularly. Remove from the flame and let cool. Refrigerate until the syrup is lightly chilled and then add the pomegranate seeds and lemon juice. Pour the mixture into ice cube trays and place in the freezer.

When the mixture is half frozen, stir well and then stir again every half hour until you have stirred the mixture 4 times in all. Pour the mixture into individual sherbet or dessert cups and let freeze solid. Transfer to the regular refrigeration compartment about 10 minutes before serving, and serve garnished with mint leaves.

Yummy desserts give sweet end to seder meal

1 tsp. salt
Freshly ground black pepper
Chicken stock
Paprika

Spray a large roasting pan with vegetable oil spray. Rinse the hens with water, but do not dry. Season to taste, inside and outside with salt, pepper and garlic powder. Sprinkle with paprika for color. Place in the prepared pan, skin side down. Cover and refrigerate.

Prepare the stuffing. Saute onion and garlic in a few tablespoons of vegetable oil. Add the celery and carrot and continue cooking until vegetables are tender and begin releasing their own juices. Turn off the heat. Add the yams, prunes, apricots, and broken up matzoh or farfel. Season with salt and pepper. Toss lightly. Moisten well with chicken stock. Cover and refrigerate.

Heat oven to 350 degrees.

Fill the cavity of each hen half with a generous portion of the stuffing. Sprinkle with paprika if desired. Cover and roast 45 minutes to 1 hour, or until the juices run clear.

makes 12 servings.

FLOATING ISLAND DESSERT

Strawberry sauce
Meringue
Caramel drizzle, optional
Additional strawberries for garnish

At serving time, pour about ¼ cup of sauce into the bottom of 12 glass bowls or dessert dishes. Loosen the meringue from the baking dish by running a knife around the edge. Remove it with a rubber spatula. Using a serrated knife, cut the meringue into 12 large islands. Place each one on top of the sauce. Reheat the caramel. Drizzle the syrup over the top of the island. Garnish with fresh strawberries.

Serves 12 generously.

MERINGUE

¼ cup sugar
12 egg whites
Dash of salt
1½ cups sugar
1 tsp. Passover vanilla

Spray a 4-quart casserole that has straight sides with vegetable oil spray. Make sure to cover the sides all the way to the top since the meringue rises very high. Sprinkle in the ¼ cup sugar. Use it to dust the sides of the casserole. Discard any extra sugar.

Heat oven to 250 degrees.

Place egg whites in a large mixing bowl. Using electric mixer at medium speed, beat until the egg whites are totally foamy. Add the dash of salt and continue beating. Increase the speed to high. Add the 1½ cups of sugar a quarter cup at a time, beating well between each addition. When the meringue is shiny and stiff peaks form when you remove the beater, add the vanilla. Pour into the prepared casserole. Smooth the top.

Bake on a cookie sheet in the lower third of the oven 40-45 minutes, or until a wooden pick comes out clean. Cool on a wire rack. Meringue will fall back into the pan. Cover with plastic wrap and refrigerate until serving time.

Assemble as directed above.

STRAWBERRY SAUCE

2 lbs. package whole strawberries frozen without sugar, partially thawed, or 1 quart of fresh strawberries, washed and hulled
1 tbsp. fresh lemon juice, or to taste
¼ cup sugar, or to taste

Process strawberries in food processor, using on/off technique. Add lemon juice, then sugar, a little at a time. Don't let it get too sweet. Process until smooth. Refrigerate until serving time.

Make 2½ cups.

CARMEL DRIZZLE

1 cup sugar
⅓ cup water

Combine sugar and water in a small saucepan. Stir well so sugar dissolves. Bring to the boil, cover, and continue cooking until the syrup starts to color. Uncover, swirl in the pan. Continue cooking and swirling until the syrup is a light caramel color. Remove from heat. Cool in a bowl of cold water. When cool, cover and set aside until serving time.

Reheat slowly over low heat. Drizzle over top of meringue as directed above.

PASSOVER FOODS

Lemony lamb chops respect the meat's distinctive flavor

Lamb, once regarded as an ethnic seasonal treat, is now a year-round staple enjoyed by a growing number of Canadians. According to the Ontario Lamb Producers Association, lamb's increasing popularity has led producers to make fresh lamb available for the table 365 days a year. Lately, Canadian consumption of lamb has been growing by more than 10 per cent per year.

"It's no wonder Canadians are enjoying more lamb more often," says Marie Ludwick, Weight Watchers president for Southern Ontario, Quebec and Atlantic Canada. "Culinary influences from several cultures have come together in Canada to create a flexible range of lamb dishes suited to most everyone's palate. At Weight Watchers, we've taken particular care to create lamb recipes that complement the meat's distinctive flavor and aroma while maintaining aspects of the dish's exotic roots."

LEMON LAMB CHOPS
Makes 4 servings

3 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
2 tsp. chopped fresh mint
1 tsp. grated lemon peel
1 tsp. dried rosemary
Eight 2½-ounce baby lamb chops
Fresh rosemary sprigs to garnish

In small bowl, combine lemon juice, mint, lemon peel and rosemary. Place lamb chops on a flat plate; coat with lemon mixture. Cover and refrigerate 1-2 hours.

Preheat broiler. Arrange chops on rack in broiler pan; broil, turning once, until cooked throughout and tender.

Carrots and tomatoes, true dairy meichels

Finding interesting dairy vegetable dishes can be hard. Here are a few adapted from Foodland Ontario recipes.

CARROT SOUFFLE

3 cups sliced Ontario Carrots (6 medium)
2 eggs, separated
½ cup sour cream
2 tbsp. butter
2 tbsp. Passover honey
¼ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. nutmeg

Cook carrots, covered, in a small amount of boiling water 10 to 15 min., until soft and very tender. Drain carrots and mash, or puree in blender or food processor. Beat egg yolks, sour cream, butter, honey, salt and nutmeg into carrot puree until well blended.

Beat egg whites until they form stiff peaks. Carefully fold into carrot mixture. Pour into greased 4 cup (1 L) casserole dish. Bake at 350 F (180 C) 40 min. Serve immediately. Serves 4.

VEGETARIAN MOUSSAKA

Traditionally, moussaka is prepared with ground meats and always with a tomato sauce. The tomatoes in this all-vegetable version provide moisture, flavor and lots of color.

2 small eggplants, peeled and cut into ½ in. thick slices
Salt
4 medium potatoes, peeled and thinly sliced
2 cups sliced mushrooms
3 large tomatoes, cut into thick slices
3 green onions, sliced
1 tsp. dried oregano
¼ tsp. coarsely ground pepper
¼ cup butter
¼ cup potato starch
2 cups (500 ml) milk
½ cup (125 ml) shredded kosher cheddar cheese
2 tbsp. grated kosher parmesan cheese

Sprinkle both sides of eggplant generously with salt and let stand on rack for 30 min.; rinse with cold water and pat dry. Layer eggplant, potatoes, mushrooms, tomatoes and onions in lightly greased 13 x 9 in. baking dish; sprinkle with oregano and pepper. In saucepan, melt butter; blend in flour. Gradually stir in milk until blended. Cook, stirring, over medium heat until boiling and thickened. Stir in cheddar cheese. Pour over vegetables; sprinkle with Parmesan. Bake, uncovered, in 350 F (180 C) oven about 1 hr. or until vegetables are tender and sauce is golden brown and bubbling. Serves 8 as side dish or 6 as main course.

CREOLE TOMATOES

A sure-fire hit when entertaining, this spicy recipe can be served as an appetizer or side dish and brings the taste of the Southern United States to your table.

4 large tomatoes
¼ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
1 small green pepper, seeded and finely chopped
1 small onion, finely chopped
3 tbsp. butter, divided
1 tbsp. potato starch
½ cup light cream
½ tsp. dried tarragon (or 2 tsp. fresh tarragon)
¼ tsp. salt
1/8 tsp. hot pepper sauce

Cut tomatoes in half crosswise. Place, cut side up, in greased 9 in. (23 cm) round shallow baking dish. Sprinkle with salt and pepper. Sprinkle green pepper and onion evenly over top of tomatoes. Dot with 2 tbsp. butter.

Bake at 350 F (180 C) for about 25 min. or until tomatoes are tender. Carefully pour cooking liquid from dish and reserve.

In small saucepan, over medium-high heat, melt remaining 1 tbsp. butter. Stir in flour and cook for 1 min. Gradually stir in cream and reserved cooking liquid. Add tarragon, salt and hot pepper sauce. Cook, stirring constantly, until sauce comes to boil and thickens slightly.

Spoon sauce over tomato halves. Place dish under pre-heated broiler and broil for 2 min. or until lightly browned. Makes 8 side dish or appetizer servings.

To Microwave

Place tomato halves in microwaveable dish. Cover with vented plastic wrap. Cook on High for 3 to 4 min., turning dish halfway through cooking time, until tomatoes are tender. For sauce, melt butter in 4 cup (1 L) microwaveable bowl on high for 30 sec. Stir in flour then add remaining ingredients. Cook on high for 1½ to 2 min., stirring occasionally. Pour sauce over tomatoes and brown under hot broiler for 2 min. or until lightly browned. Serves 8.

Kitchen hocus-pocus keeps Passover meals interesting

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

To paraphrase A Tale of Two Cities "it's the best of times and it's the worst of times." Or how about, matzah matzah everywhere and nary a stewed prune in sight.

Take heart. Passover is only 8 days long and with a little hocus-pocus in the kitchen you can get through this week without feeling like there is a matzah ball the size of New York traveling down your digestive track.

TEN VEGETABLE STEW WITH DUMPLINGS
(Vegetarian)

2 onions, chopped
1 leek, chopped
2 carrots, sliced
2 red peppers, chopped
1 green pepper, chopped
2 tomatoes, peeled, seeded, chunked
2 ribs celery, chopped
8 oz. sliced mushrooms
2 medium zucchini, sliced
2 medium yellow squash, sliced
1 can, 6 oz. tomato paste
1 to 2 tbsp. red wine (not sweet)
1 tbsp. chopped basil
1 tbsp. sugar
1 tsp. salt

Dumpling

2 eggs
1½ cup matzah meal
1 tsp. salt
½ cup water
6 tbsp. oil
2 tsp. chopped parsley

Heat ½ cup oil in heavy pot. Add vegetables and saute for 10 minutes. Add the tomato paste, wine, salt, and sugar with 1 cup of water. Cover and cook for 20 min. Mix the dumpling ingredients and form small balls. Use a wooden spoon to make a small indentation in the stew and drop the dumplings in. Cover and cook 20 min. Serves 6 to 8. (Cooked chicken or beef can be added).

PASSOVER LEMON BARS

1 cup matzah cake meal
½ cup pareve, Passover margarine
¼ cup "powdered sugar" (see below)
4 large eggs
2 cups granulated sugar
1 tsp. Passover baking powder
⅛ tsp. salt
⅔ cup lemon juice

Preheat oven 350. Beat together cake meal, margarine, and "powdered sugar" until well blended. Press into bottom of 9 in. square pan. Bake 15 to 20 min. (lightly browned). Combine eggs, granulated sugar, baking powder, salt, and lemon juice, beat until smooth. Pour over baked crust and return to oven until bubbly and lightly browned, about 30 min. Cool and sprinkle with "powdered sugar" and cut into bars.

Note: I find my ingenuity tested to its limit at this time of year. I can't always find the kosher for Passover items that I need. So rather than do without. I make them myself.

POWDERED SUGAR

1 cup granulated sugar minus 2 tbsp.
2 tbsp. potato starch

Mix together in a food processor for about 2 seconds, or place in a plastic baggie and shake together.

FRUIT GAZPACHO

2 cups tomato puree
3 cups orange juice, with pulp
2 tsp. sugar
Zest of 1 orange and 1 lime
2 cups diced cantaloupe
2 cups diced honeydew
1 mango peeled and diced (optional)
1 apple peeled and diced
1 cup blueberries
1 cup green or red seedless grapes, cut in half
Fresh strawberries
1 or 2 kiwi, peeled and sliced

Combine tomato puree, orange juice, sugar, orange and lemon zest, cantaloupe, honeydew and mango in a large bowl. Process half the mixture in a food processor until smooth. Pour the mixture over the fruit in the bowl, mix well. Stir in the apple, blueberries and grapes. Refrigerate covered for several hours.

Ladle soup into bowls and garnish with several strawberry halves and a couple of kiwi slices. Serves 8.

Spicy flavors add real zing to veggies

Sharp, spicy flavors can go a long way to make you forget what you can't have on Pesach.

Try these recipes from Foodland Ontario for an added kick to your meals.

POTATOES VINAIGRETTE

2 lbs. new potatoes (14 to 16)
½ cup sliced celery
2 tbsp. sliced green onions
¼ cup vegetable oil
2 tbsp. red wine vinegar, kosher for Passover
1 tsp. salt
½ tsp. dried tarragon
1/8 tsp. pepper
Iceberg lettuce, torn into bite-size pieces

Wash potatoes. Cook, covered, in boiling salted water for 15 to 20 min. or until tender. Drain; cut into quarters. Add celery.

Combine green onions with remaining ingredients, except lettuce, in jar with tight-fitting lid. Shake well. Pour over potatoes and celery and toss gently. Cover and chill several hours or overnight. Serve on lettuce. Serves 6.

GAZPACHO

Appealing chunks of Ontario greenhouse tomatoes and cucumbers give this easy Gazpacho a spicy, springtime freshness perfect for entertaining. For best flavor results, prepare and refrigerate this soup the day before. At serving time, simply stir the gazpacho well and spoon into cups or bowls.

6 tomatoes, peeled
1 cucumber
1 small onion, peeled
1 clove garlic, minced
1 tsp. salt
1 cup tomato juice
3 tbsp. Passover vegetable oil
3 tbsp. vinegar

To peel tomatoes, dip in boiling water for 30 seconds, then in ice water. Slip skins off.

Coarsely chop half the tomatoes, cucumbers and onion. Combine in blender jar with garlic and salt. Add tomato juice, vegetable oil and vinegar. Puree mixture in blender (don't make too smooth a puree).

Finely chop remaining tomatoes, half cucumber and onion. Combine in large bowl. Pour puree mixture over chopped vegetables; stir to mix. Cover and refrigerate at least 2 to 3 hours or overnight. Before serving, stir the soup well. Serves 6 to 8.

Meals on eighth day can still be creative

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

The test of the truly creative Passover chef is not what you serve for the seder. It's what you serve on the seventh and eighth day when you feel like the only good matzah is a dead matzah.

I know, I know. Every year you promise yourself that this year it's going to be different. This year all the meals will be tasty and your kids will not have to resort to Crispy O's for breakfast every day. What I want to give you are truly different recipes that don't sit in your stomach for the next two weeks.

VEGETABLE SOUFFLE

1 pkg. frozen spinach, defrosted or 10 oz. fresh, cooked and drained
½ lb. cooked, chopped asparagus
1 medium onion chopped fine
1 shredded carrot
8 oz. cream cheese
1 lb. cottage cheese
½ cup matzah meal
3 eggs, beaten
Salt and pepper to taste

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 1 qt. souffle dish. Cook spinach and drain well. Mix the asparagus, onion and carrot with the spinach. Melt the cream cheese in the microwave or over boiling water and stir into the hot spinach mixture. Add the cottage cheese and matzah meal. Mix well. Stir in the eggs, salt, and pepper. Pour into the souffle dish and bake 40 minutes or until golden on top. Serves 6.

TUNA AND PINEAPPLE

8 oz. can pineapple chunks, drained
6½ oz. can tuna drained and flaked
¼ cup chopped celery
1 small banana, sliced
½ cup Pesach mayonnaise
3 tbsp. fresh basil, chopped
Lettuce
Fresh melon
¼ cup chopped walnuts

In a medium bowl, combine pineapple, tuna, celery, banana, mayonnaise and basil. Toss lightly, cover and refrigerate. Place lettuce on 4 individual plates, mound ¼ of the tuna mixture on each plate and arrange melon around it. Sprinkle chopped nuts over the top and serve.

RASPBERRY BLUSH PEAR SALAD

Dressing

⅓ cup Pesach vinegar
½ cup seedless raspberry preserves
2 tbsp. oil

Salad

3 pears, peeled and sliced
Fresh spinach, washed and torn
2 kiwis peeled and sliced
½ cup fresh raspberries

In a small saucepan combine all the dressing ingredients. Cook on low until preserves are melted and dressing is hot. Pour dressing over the sliced pears. Toss and cover. Let stand 15 min. Drain, saving the dressing, and refrigerate pears and dressing for 30 min. Arrange spinach on a serving plate. Top with pears, kiwi, and raspberries. Drizzle ½ dressing over salad and serve remaining dressing with salad. Serves 4 to 6.

'Lager sisters' plan reunion after 50 years

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — At last fall's Jewish Book Fair, a survivor of Auschwitz-Birkenau picked up an autobiographical account of a woman's time in the notorious death camp. On reading Liana Millu's Smoke Over Birkenau, North York resident Judith Rubinstein realized that the author's story could have been her own.

"When I started to read the book, a strange feeling came over me. I felt as if I could have written it. The whole book was a revelation to me. I felt I had to find this 'lager' sister with whom I had so much in common. I don't remember her face; 50 years is a long time, but I felt as if I had found a long-lost relative," she said.

Rubinstein telephoned the Italian consulate, and within half an hour she had the author's address in Genoa, Italy. She wrote Millu immediately, and two weeks later she received a reply.

"I was so deeply moved reading your letter. I have read it again and again. Certainly we were together in Birkenau, Ravensbruck and Malhow," wrote Millu.

A journalist, Millu was arrested in Venice when she was 24, after an informer identified her as a member of a partisan group. The interrogating colonel refused to deal with Jews and so she avoided being tortured; however, she ended up in Auschwitz-Birkenau in August 1944.

The 24-year-old Millu found herself in a block made up entirely of Hungarian Jews. In her book, she recalls feeling alienated from the other women as she was unable to communicate with them, knowing neither Hungarian nor German.

Judith Rubinstein (nee Schwarcz), then also 24, was one of the Hungarian Jews in the block, having arrived at the camp in May 1944. "Because we lived in the same barracks, her tattoo number is very close to mine," said Rubinstein.

Although Rubinstein and Millu never got to know one another during the war years, Rubinstein realized that she had worked with Millu, when she read the account of the back-breaking labor Millu did as part of a road-building crew of 200 women. "I pulled apart stones," said Rubinstein. "The stones came from a bombed-out house and by bare hand we pulled them apart. Liana filled big containers with sand, and she had to push them by hand. They were especially heavy after rain."

After the October uprising in Auschwitz-Birkenau, in which workers blew up a crematorium, Rubinstein, Millu and about 1,000 other women were taken to Germany. They were sent to Ravensbruck, a transit camp where a second "selection" process took place. They made it through the second selection, as they had the first one that had taken place on their arrival at Auschwitz-Birkenau. Rubinstein and Millu become two of a thousand women who survived until the German surrender in May of 1945 by working in a camp at Malhow, the site of a large munitions fctory.

Chanukah in Birkenau

Millu writes in Smoke over Birkenau of how some 36 inmates of Malhow observed Chanukah, an occasion that Rubinstein recalls too. The women were unable to keep track of time because they were not allowed to have a calendar, Rubinstein said, so it might have been impossible for them to know when Chanukah fell if it had not been for one brave and ingenious woman. She got hold of the stub of a pencil that she held in her mouth during regular inspections, for which the women were naked. Every day she pencilled a mark on her inner thighs to keep track of time.

They made "candles" with the tiny weekly rations of margarine they received and the threads from their rough blankets. One woman stood at the door as a lookout in case the Nazis came to the barracks. "Everyone was singing and crying, hoping we would make it," said Rubinstein, adding that Chanukah had never been so meaningful.

Rubinstein was liberated by the Americans in the spring of 1945, and she said Millu was liberated by the Russians. After Rubinstein and nine other women left Malhow they encountered French soldiers who directed them to the Americans. The French soldiers warned the women to stay clear of the Russians, as rumors of their brutality and stories about their raping women had been circulating.

Rubinstein's mother, two younger brothers and her father were killed by the Nazis. Her mother and her then six-year-old brother were murdered on their arrival at Auschwitz-Birkenau; her father and a brother she last saw when he was 16 died in labor camps. At the end of the war Rubinstein returned to Hungary to discover only one other family member had survived. One of her brothers, Jichak Schwarcz, currently living in Israel, had been rescued by the Swedish diplomat Raoul Wallenberg.

She met Bill Rubinstein in Hungary in 1946. The same year they went to Italy, to the outskirts of Torino, the site of a Displaced Persons' camp, and waited there to make aliyah. They got married in June.

Powerful testimony

In the camp Rubinstein taught dressmaking at an Organization for Rehabilitation through Training (ORT) workshop. A trained dressmaker, she said her dressmaking skills helped her to survive the concentration camps. After three years, tired of waiting in Italy to make aliyah, the Rubinsteins, along with their infant son, left for Canada in 1948.

Millu returned to Italy after the war, to her native Genoa. "I was alone. I had nothing. It was a horrible period as I was trying to return to normal life." She worked as a teacher and continued to write.

Smoke Over Birkenau, originally published in 1947, was hailed by Primo Levi as "one of the most powerful European testimonies to come from the women's lager at Auschwitz-Birkenau." Published by the Jewish Publication Society, the English translation was done by novelist Lynne Sharon Schwartz. Schwartz's translation was honored by PEN, the international writers' organization, with the Renato Poggioli Award for Translation in 1991.

Millu is the author of From Liguria to the Extermination Camps, a non-fiction book; The Bridges of Schwerin, a novel that won the Viareggio Prize in 1978; and Joseph's Shirt, a collection of stories. Her work is included in the Italian anthology, Twentieth-Century Ligurian Writers.

Millu lives by herself in Genoa surrounded by good friends. In her first letter to Rubinstein she wrote that the "memory of our inhuman treatment is still very much in my mind. We are the last eye witnesses. Time is running out for our generation."

Still active in the community, she delivers "the message to young souls, to warn them about violence and its consequences."

As a member of the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre's speakers' bureau for the past four years, Rubinstein also delivers the message to the young. She has told her story to hundreds of high school and university students and warns them about the perils of neo-Nazism.

Rubinstein and Millu will finally meet at the end of June. In her first letter, Rubinstein invited Millu to visit her in Toronto, but Millu declined. "I always wished to visit Canada, but I am too old for travelling, I can travel in my dreams only," Millu wrote back. Eager to meet her "soul sister," Rubinstein plans to visit Millu in Italy this summer.

She will be accompanied by her son Robert Eli Rubinstein and his family. Her son wants to see the site of the Displaced Persons' camp where he was born.

Israeli institute cares for handicapped children

By DAVID HERSHAM
Special to the CJN

Those of you who have ever spent the Jewish festivals in Jerusalem, have probably come away, as I have, with the impression that the holiday is celebrated, not in the synagogues, but rather in the lobby of your smart hotel. Somehow I've never been able to make it past the revolving doors out of the lobby and into the reality of Jerusalem. Until this year.

I had struck up a casual conversation with an older American gentleman from Long Island. We joked a little about the shallow Life In The Lobby, but we both admitted it had a certain fascination. Suddenly he became serious and told me he knew just the thing to jog the senses. He told me he did it himself every time he was in Jerusalem. There was this place, he said. What, I interrupted — the house of a holy rebbe? A miracle spring? No, just a children's home, he replied. I was skeptical. How much can a man from Long Island know? Quite a lot, as it turns out.

I went to visit the place some time later. It's called Keren Or and is located in the Jerusalem suburb of Ramot. On the surface there is nothing remarkable about the building. It is new and very pleasant, in the tradition of recent institutional buildings in Jerusalem and is obviously well thought out, but it doesn't really prepare you for what goes on inside.

It is late morning when I arrive and am met by a lady who is to show me around. She doesn't really introduce herself but leads me right to a room at the back of the building. Inside the room is a boy, maybe thirteen years old and quite tall for his age, holding a lit candle. He is practising lighting the Chanukah candelabrum, which I find out later he has been chosen to do during the holiday on behalf of all the children.

His hand moves slowly and tentatively towards the candelabrum, but then another hand, that of his teacher, clasps his and guides it to the intended candle. Together they light it.

The 15-year-old boy is blind. He is also autistic. The lady showing me around is a teacher as well. She explains that the common denominator among the Keren Or children is that they are all blind and all multi-handicapped. While I am thinking, trying to absorb that information, I look beyond the boy through a window, past a huge outside terrace play-area for the children and see the beautiful view of the Judean Hills. The irony is almost numbing.

Next we visit the classrooms, one by one, and I begin to learn what Keren Or does. The children are grouped by age and ability. In the nursery class I see a child who cannot lift his head and another who has no natural aptitude to sit up on her own. Most of the children have virtually no ability to communicate, let alone speak. How do you communicate when you have no sight and perhaps no motor skills because you have a physical or mental disability? I also see a number of women — in this room they all happen to be young — tending to the children. I count them. There are two to each child.

What Keren Or does is to develop in its children and teach them some of those basic skills they were born without. Its aim is to try and realize the full potential of each child and the possibility of giving them some degree of functional independence. It also serves to relieve the pressure on the families of the children, who cannot give them such special care.

Keren Or, I learn, is one of the few institutions worldwide and the only one in the Jewish world that provides care for multi-handicapped blind children. It can accommodate only 60 children in its residential and day program combined. What happens, I wonder to myself, to all the other children with similar disabilities? I don't think I really want to know the answer.

My guide points out details of the building and other facilities that I would have otherwise overlooked: individually constructed chairs, specially designed eating utensils, raised floor markings, a talking elevator that indentifies floors and gives directions, personalized closet handles and various other tools and amenities built for a specific child or group.

I ask her about her work as we come to another classroom where children are receiving physical therapy and mobility training. She has been at Keren Or for six years. She cried for three days when she first arrived, not out of sentiment, but at the apparent futility of trying to help these children.

The children's progress is often barely perceptible after staff have worked with them for years, she said, and the teachers can become very depressed as a result. The rewards in seeing visible improvements in the children come in very small doses, but when they do come, they are uplifting. "Take a little boy who is not born with the instinct to eat. If I see that child progressing to eating by himself, it is a personal triumph for me."

She doesn't think parents see this progress in the same way. For the parents, it is sometimes an isolated victory on a small battlefield, knowing the main war can never be won. This she thinks is the biggest tragedy. Nevertheless she says they try to get parents involved because family encouragement is such a major factor in the children's progress. If the connection between child and parent is strong, the capacity for improvement is much greater.

In the next classroom, a young teacher is playing a guitar and singing to the children with two of her colleagues. Most of the children respond with some sort of movement. One child screams an anguished scream, but then relaxes and smiles to the music. The genuine bond between teacher and child is apparent. The majority of the staff are trained specialists, some are volunteers and others are doing their national service. All admit the workload is very stressful. Another thing I learn at Keren Or is to dismiss the cliched notion that national service is a soft option of the army.

To end my visit, I am invited into the administration office to meet Keren Or's educational director and principal. He tells me about outside activities, particularly the groundbreaking research being carried out on behalf of Keren Or at the Jerusalem College of Technology. The goal is to apply technology to alleviate the children's infirmities, and the results will benefit those who have similar disabilities throughout the world.

One Keren Or patron is funding a complex project to establish instruments and devices which can be used in understanding and communicating with the children. He is genuinely proud when he tells me that Keren Or has initiated hi-tech research in the field of robotics in an attempt to improve the children's motor abilities, and in the field of fiber optics to try and enhance their residual visual capability.

He mentions finances and emphasizes that Keren Or relies on voluntary contributions from overseas for 90 per cent of its operating budget. I sense a fund-raising speech, but there is no danger — he simply complains that he can't take in all the children he would like to. I think to myself that I should rush back to my hotel and do lobby circuits until I raise every penny he will ever need.

As I get up to leave, the boy who was lighting the Chanukah candles, comes to say goodbye to me and puts out his arms to be hugged. How do you feel when a child who can't see and who could never communicate with anybody until they taught him how, wants you to hug him?

Thank you Keren Or and thank you that man in Long Island.

You can visit Keren Or if you're in Israel, at 3 Abba Hillel Silver Street, Ramot, Jerusalem. (Israenet)

Theatre students show Possibilities

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two young Jewish theatre students at York University have landed on the local dramatic scene with a flourish.

Undertaking a challenging play and following through like seasoned professionals, Sam Rosenthal, director, and Eli Lukawitz, assistant director, with the help of about 16 other York theatre students, presented Possibilities by Howard Barker Feb. 28-Mar. 5.

It's a difficult play because Barker is downbeat in his depiction of human relationships, and more than one meaning is possible in each of the 10 separate scenes. Barker himself says in a program note: "If a scene might mean more than two things, it should not be reduced to one."

All the production values are good: the costumes, the lighting, the sound, the ease with which sets are moved without delaying the action. The 11 actors do not betray any of the tentativeness which mark some student productions. They understand the multi-layered characters they play. Perhaps it takes young actors to understand the complicated world that informs Barker's vision.

Extra credit is due Rosenthal, son of Joseph and Diane Rosenthal of Toronto, for it is his FOL Productions which staged and financed the production, though it was a showpiece for York University.

There was a special bustle of excitement at the opening because its locale was the Studio Theatre at the spanking new North York Performing Arts Centre, an intimate space which has 200 seats.

Lukawitz brought off the acting gem of the evening as a bookseller in present-day Toronto who sees the thought police about to descend on his stall looking for subversive books. As is typical of Barker, his bookseller is not the stout-hearted advocate of free speech, but a hilarious, small-minded bean-counter type. Lukawitz is absolutely superb in this characterization, abetted by Rod Arsenault, the man who tries to buy one of the books.

An outstanding performance is also given by J.J. Hunt, as the torturer who seeks bed and board from a dumb innkeeper. "I'm not solitary, nor am I convivial," he says, ambiguously. Is human nature as perverse as Barker claims? For in this scene, the woman innkeeper's plan to have her daughter slay the torturer is turned around, to her delight, so that the daughter is slain and the mother becomes the object of the torturer's ardor.

Katherine Clark was strong as the peasant groom polishing the Emperor's boots, while Iain DeJong as the Emperor and as the returning veteran in the final scene had good command of their roles. In that final scene, Stacey Baer was outstanding too.

Other actors were Kim Magee, Jennifer Baer, Heather Lash, Karla Faulconbridge and Fiona Wall.

Kids' stories take on serious issues

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Corespondent

WINNIPEG — In writing We're Still A Family, Frances Arnold drew on stories she first wrote for her son.

"It was an exhilarating experience," she says. "The book explores the emotional reality of a child whose parents have separated. It can help them express their feelings and responses. This is my contribution to the United Nations Year of the Family."

Arnold learned to write at the knee of her father, Abe Arnold, Canada's pre-eminent historian of Jewish life in Canada. (His new book, From The Religious To The Secular, is due out soon.) She has previously had a book of poems and short stories published and has worked as a freelance journalist. She is currently on a six-month leave from her government job as co-ordinator of volunteers for the Health and Family Services Department to market her new book and develop other projects.

Arnold began making up stories for her young son, Jeremiah, after she and his father separated in the summer of 1990. "It was difficult finding children's books that portrayed single-parent families," she says. "A lady in a bookstore suggested I make up my own. I went home and wrote a story for Jeremiah (who was two years old at the time). It practically wrote itself. Jeremiah wanted me to read it again and again."

Book portrays single-parent families

After she had written a few more stories, a friend who read them suggested Arnold apply for a Manitoba Arts Council grant to do a book. She originally wrote We're Still a Family as poetry, working with Saskatchewan Jewish poet Mick Burrs.

"The first friend I read the manuscript to was moved to tears," she recalls. "I knew I had something."

Noted Winnipeg children's author Sheldon Oberman also read the manuscript. He suggested she change the poetry to free verse. Although she followed his advice, she notes the stories still have much poetic imagery.

The slim, soft-covered volume, which Arnold published herself, is a series of stand-alone short stories in poetic form, connected by the ongoing emotional adjustments the child has to make as he (or she) is told, first, that the parents are separated and later, that the father is moving to another city. Arnold says she tried to portray the child in the book (illustrated by Lori Broadfoot, a Winnipeg artist) in such a way that both boys and girls could identify with it.

Arnold is launching We're Still A Family on March 20 in Winnipeg and hopes to have copies available in eastern Canada by the spring. In the meantime, she has two other children's books in the works. One is a Jewish alphabet book tentatively called Bagels And Dreidels. The other, which will come with a tape, she describes as a "parent-child love poem."

BILL GLADSTONE'S EYE ON ARTS

Calling All Jewish Immigrant Artists: Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) is sponsoring an art exhibit featuring the two-dimensional works of Jewish immigrant artists. The juried exhibit is slated to run at the Koffler Gallery Studio from April 15 to May 1. A Meet The Artists reception is scheduled for April 23 at 8:30 p.m.

"We're really delighted that the Koffler Gallery has been so very supportive," says JIAS volunteer board member Sandy Atlin, who is organizing the immigrant art show. "The gallery is giving us space at what is their busiest time of year. They feel that it's very appropriate for them to be giving space so immigrant artists can show their work and acquaint the community with what they have to offer."

JIAS is inviting Jewish immigrant artists to submit entries to the exhibition. "It doesn't matter whether they've been here for 40 years or 40 minutes," says Atlin. Immigrants who arrived in the 1920s, Holocaust survivors and recent arrivals from the former Soviet Union or elsewhere are equally eligible. Interested artists should phone Paulina at JIAS, (416) 630-6481, to obtain an application form before the April 4 deadline. Due to space limitations, only two-dimensional art works will be considered. Coinciding with the conclusion of the art show on May 1, Atlin is planning a community leadership conference that will examine the issues of integrating immigrants into the Canadian Jewish establishment.

The Modern Revitalization of Hebrew: At the turn of this century, Jews vehemently discussed the issue as to what language to adopt — Yiddish, Russian, French, German, Hebrew, English — as the national tongue of the developing Jewish homeland. Hebrew, then an ancient Biblical language that had not been widely spoken for two millenia, was the dark horse in this pivotal race. Its ascendancy as the language of choice is primarily the result of the tireless efforts of one man — Eliezer Ben Yehuda, whose zealous struggles took a heavy toll on his personal life. The Wordmaker is an Israeli film in English and Hebrew, directed by Eli Cohen, that tells the story of Ben Yehuda's fight to make Hebrew the national language of Palestine.

The Toronto Jewish Film Society is screening The Wordmaker at The Art Gallery of Ontario (AGO), Jackman Hall, 317 Dundas St. W., Toronto, on March 13 at 7:30 p.m. Prof. Libby Garshowitz from the University of Toronto's Near Eastern Studies department is introducing the film and leading a discussion of Ben Yehuda's work after the screening. Tickets are $7 ($6 for AGO members), available at the door.

Notes from All Over: Still, a moving comedy conceived and performed by Leah Cherniak and Martha Ross, begins previews March 11 and opens March 15 at Theatre Passe Muraille Backspace, 16 Ryerson Ave., Toronto. Directed by Banuta Rubess from a script by Beverley Cooper, Still teeters precariously between comedy and tragedy. Its two characters are the same as those in the hit show Cooking With Columbus. The play is a production of Theatre Columbus.

Jerry Lewis hosts a multi-media presentation highlighting his 45 years in show business at Roy Thomson Hall, March 16 at 8 p.m. This retrospective look at his career includes singing, dancing, comedy, film footage and music from the 16-piece Jerry Lewis Orchestra. Tickets start at $29.50 and are available from the Roy Thomson Hall box office or by phoning (416) 872-4255.

Eighty impressionist, post-impressionist and modernist paintings are featured in the show From Cezanne to Matisse: Great French Paintings from The Barnes Foundation which arrives at the Art Gallery of Ontario Sept.17 for an exclusive showing until year's end. Featured artists include Renoir, Matisse, Cezanne, Toulouse-Lautrec, Picasso, Van Gogh, Monet, Manet, Seurat, Rousseau, Modigliani and Braque.

Sam Malkin, local Jewish actor of note, rounds out a cast that includes Pat Harrington, Mary Long and Peter James Hawarth for the comic hit Breaking Legs. The title is a pun on what happens when the worlds of theatre and the Mafia overlap. Fresh from off-Broadway, the play is currently drawing audiences to Stage West All-Suite Hotel & Theatre Restaurant, 5400 Dixie Rd., Mississauga. For tickets, phone (416) 238-0159.

Congratulations to the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band, whose latest release Agada: Tales From Our Ancestors has been nominated for a Juno in 1994. This year, the band is scheduled to tour the United Kingdom on three separate occasions. Torontonians also have three opportunities of hearing the Flying Bulgars next month, as they are scheduled to play at Clinton's Tavern on Bloor Street West on April 6, 13 and 20. Their warm-up act on these evenings is Yiddishist and stand-up comic Michael Wex.

Congratulations are also in order for the Western Canadian klezmer band Finjan, which received a Juno nomination for its release, Crossing Selkirk Avenue.

The above-mentioned Wex, a self-styled "itinerant teacher of Yiddish," does stand-up and storytelling March 23 at the Mezzetta Cafe Restaurant, 681 St. Clair Ave. W., Toronto.

Jazz guitarist Lorne Lofsky and pianist John Gittins hold the stage at Mezzetta on March 9. Phone (416) 658-5687 for show times and covers. Unless I'm mistaken, Wex, Lofsky and your humble arts reporter all attended the legendary Mackenzie C.I. sometime before the last ice age.

Executive's Book Of Quotations by Julia Vitullo-Martin & J. Robert Moskin (Oxford University Press $42.00)

Benjamin Disraeli wrote that "The wisdom of the wise and the experience of the ages are perpetuated by quotations." The Talmud seems to agree, for it maintains that "A quotation at the right moment is like bread in a famine."

Perhaps in our multi-media age we should regard quotes as literary sound bytes that provide instant access to enduring thoughts and great minds. To have meaning, quotes should be terse, witty, memorable, wise or audacious. In any case we want to remember them and use them to our advantage. They pepper our daily speech, are inevitable in political addresses and sermons and find a necessary place in modern advertising.

The authors provide 5,000 quotations, compiled specifically for business executives and have culled their material from newspapers, magazines, books, movies and poetry. For the casual browser or for those seeking the apt quotation for a speech or article or simply to enliven dinner table conversation, this book will provide both information and entertainment.

The quotations that follow are some of those that had personal appeal.

If the rich could hire other people to die for them, the poor could make a wonderful living. Yiddish proverb.

The only place where success comes before work is in a dictionary. Vidal Sassoon.

Show me a guy who's afraid to look bad, and I'll show you a guy you can beat every time. Lou Brock.

I've never been poor, only broke. Being poor is frame of mind. Being broke is only a temporary situation. Mike Todd.

Canada was supposed to get British government, French culture, and American know-how. Instead, it got French government, American culture and British know-how. Lester Pearson.

One way to make sure crime doesn't pay would be to let the government run it. Ronald Reagan.

If the nation's economists were laid end to end, they would point in all directions. Anonymous.

Murdoch used to love repeating the joke that the sun never set on the British empire because God didn't trust the Brits after dark. William Shawcross.

An ever present danger that flows from an enthusiasm for other people's thoughts is that they can become a substitute for one's own thinking. Some quotations, moreover, should be approached gingerly for they may be torn from context to say what was never intended.

This useful volume is enhanced with a list of sources, an index of names and an index of cross topics for quick reference.

Following The Americans To The Persian Gulf by Ronnie Miller (Fairleigh Dickinson Press $32.50 US)

Ronnie Miller, director of Religious Education at Temple Anshe Sholom in Hamilton, is a perceptive student of foreign affairs. He received his doctorate from the University of Toronto and has taught in the Department of Near Eastern and Judaic Studies at the University of Manitoba.

This book traces the foreign policy formulations in Canada and Australia with special reference to the time of the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait to the commencement of Operation Desert Storm (August 1990-January 1991). These two geographically distant but politically similar middle powers had to make vital decisions against the backdrop of a host of national and international changes and problems.

How both nations regarded and treated Israel over a period of some years — and especially during the Gulf crisis is described from the promise by Prime Minister Joe Clark to move the Canadian Embassy to Jerusalem, to the condemnation of Israel for destroying Iraq's nuclear facility, to the effort to prevent any Israeli military reaction to Iraqi Scud attacks.

An interesting sidelight on the Israeli fear of an Iraqi gas attack were the special requirements of the Ultra-Orthodox community. "Since most of the instructions for the use of gas masks were given to civilians through the media, this information was unavailable to the Ultra-Orthodox community. However, because their security was at stake, their Chief Rabbi eventually gave permission several days before the ultimatum expired for the placement of two big television screens in Bnai-Brak. There, Ultra-Orthodox Jews could assemble to watch televised instructions on the use of gas masks. There were separate televised sessions for men and women."

Miller relates that when the heads of the Jewish Agency decided to cancel a meeting scheduled to take place in Israel for security reasons, the famous conductor Zubin Mehta declared, "I was about to fly from Paris to New York for a rehearsal of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, but suddenly I felt that I was about to fly in the wrong direction: I had to fly home to Israel."

The author concludes his interesting and readable survey with the assertion that both Canada and Australia faced similar domestic and international pressures at the time of the Gulf crisis and that they had to avoid antagonizing countries critical to their own economic well being. "The way to gain a ticket to recognized status, with minimal economic damage to themselves, was to deploy a token force. This they promptly and intelligently did."

Erudite study analyzes Freud's 'Moses'

By ROSE KLEINER

Freud's last major book, the controversial Moses and Monotheism, has recently become the focus of a detailed analysis by Professor Yosef Hayim Yerushalmi, of Columbia University.

A slim volume of only 100 pages, this erudite study is filled with detailed information and with extensive, excellent notes.

The book explores Freud's life and Jewish identity as they relate to the meaning of his Moses and Monotheism.

Freud's thesis in Moses and Monotheism is that monotheism is not of Jewish origin; rather it is an Egyptian discovery, established as a state religion by the pharaoh, Ikhnaton. After Ikhnaton's death, the Egyptians rejected monotheism.

According to Freud, Moses was not a Hebrew, but an Egyptian priest or noble, and a fervent monotheist. He created a new nation out of an oppressed Semitic tribe, in order to save the monotheism rejected by the Egyptians.

But the Semitic tribe, unable to bear the demands of the new faith, killed Moses and repressed his memory. Over the centuries, writes Freud, the submerged tradition of the new faith and its founder reasserted itself. But the memory of Moses' murder, says Freud, remained repressed.

Freud's purpose in this book was to trace the origin of the Jewish religion, which had given the Jews their special character.

In his book, Freud justifies his study as an inquiry into "what the real nature of a tradition resides in, and what its special power rests on."

Yerushalmi relates Freud's deep interest in this question to a comment Freud once made in a letter, about the land of Israel — "we hail from there ... and it is impossible to say what heritage from this land we have taken over into our blood and nerves."

The essential drama of Moses and Monotheism, according to Yerushalmi, is Freud's concern with revealing the "secret of religious tradition." For Freud, he says, its power lies in the return of the repressed, in the triggering of hitherto unconscious memories of real events from the remote past.

As a historical essay, Yerushalmi states, "Moses and Monotheism offers a singular vision of history as essentially a story of remembering and forgetting."

Trying to interpret Freud's thesis, Yerushalmi speaks of the difficulty of "grasping the nature of Freud's Jewish identity."

Freud's statements about his Jewish background are seen by Yerushalmi as projecting three images, which became part of his public personna. Freud claimed to have had little Jewish religious education, a home where Jewish observance was minimal, and an ignorance of Hebrew and Yiddish.

Yerushalmi finds these assertions problematic even with respect to the limited information available about Freud's early life. He finds that "at every turn there are hints and fragments that challenge the images Freud publicly projected."

He challenges Freud's professed ignorance of Hebrew and Yiddish by showing that Freud had studied Hebrew throughout his Gymnasium years, and that at least his father, if not his mother, was fluent in Yiddish.

For a better understanding of Moses and Monotheism in terms of Freud's inner life, Yerushalmi points to an episode connected with Freud's 35th birthday, when his father gave him a Hebrew Bible inscribed with an elaborate Hebrew dedication, one that was, "in content and spirit, the utterance of a tradition-minded Jew."

Freud's public formulation of his Jewish identity, repeated throughout his life, was expressed in 1925 as follows: "I can say that I stand as far from the Jewish religion as from all other religions . . . On the other hand, I have always had a strong feeling of belonging together with my people, and have always nurtured it in my children as well."

In 1926, Freud stated, "my language ... culture, my attainments are German. I considered myself German intellectually, until I noticed the growth of anti-Semitic prejudices in Germany ... Since that time, I prefer to call myself a Jew." Freud felt more at home in his B'nai Brith group than in any other society, says Yerushalmi.

The final part of Yerushalmi's book is called Monologue with Freud. Here the author addresses Freud directly, as a fellow Jew.

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

PHILADELPHIA — "This is an authentic cathedral building of modern times. Here is Man seeking God," declares Robert Weil as he leads the small group of visitors up the carpeted stairs of Beth Sholom Synagogue in Elkins Park, Pa., a suburb of Philadelphia. As intended, the main sanctuary with its sand-coloured carpet, modernistic triangular chandelier and soaring glass ceiling provokes gasps of awe from the newcomers. The product of a lengthy collaboration between the eminent American architect Frank Lloyd Wright and the late Rabbi Mortimer J. Cohen, the building weaves Jewish and American motifs and symbols into an integrated, awesome, utterly pleasing whole. "Mr. Wright decided to let God be the artist," Weil explains, waving a hand upwards at the vast translucent roof. "If it's a cloudy day, it will be overcast in here. If it's sunny, it will be sunny in here too. On a sunny day, when a bird flies overhead you can see the shadow going over the congregation."

Shaped like a biblical tent or Mount Sinai itself, Beth Sholom is the only synagogue Wright designed; he died just months before its dedication in April 1959. The architecture alone has inspired visiting Jews to return to the fold after decades away, Weil says. He seems proud of his shul, proud of the many admiring architects who visit from all over the world, proud that a visiting wit once penned "Pope John Paul, eat your heart out!" in the guestbook. Yet Weil acknowledges that the edifice itself is not the end-all be-all for worshippers, who number up to 4,000 during the High Holy Days. "We're very proud of the building, but to us the ruach, the spirit, is even more important," he says.

Unpaid historian and archivist for the 75-year-old Conservative congregation, Weil escaped a concentration camp early in World War II, then joined the U.S. army and returned to Europe to liberate others. Now a bent and elderly man, he says he'll continue to give guided tours of Beth Sholom as long as the good Lord allows. Planning a visit to Philadelphia? Phone 215-887-1342 to arrange a tour.

At least two other synagogues are worth visiting in America's famed City of Brotherly Love. Dating from 1740, Mikveh Israel is the second-oldest congregation in the United States. Built as a bicentennial project, the congregation's fifth synagogue is modern and unexceptional, but it's attached to the National Museum of American Jewish History, where the highly topical Bridges and Boundaries exhibition is currently on view. The show explores the historic relationship between American blacks and Jews, displaying such telling artifacts as a Jewish candelabra with a bullet hole beside a notice of an 1835 slave auction, and items relating to the civil rights movement and other shared ground. (The show travels to Chicago after closing in Philadelphia later this month.) The museum, situated near historic Independence Park a short walk from the Liberty Bell, has a permanent exhibit, The American Jewish Experience, which traces Jewish participation in the founding of the nation.

Rodeph Shalom (615 North Broad St.) is an exquisitely ornate, byzantine shul modeled after the Great Synagogue of Florence, Italy. The sanctuary is spiritually majestic with its vaulted domed ceiling, stenciled mosaic walls and splendid stained glass windows. Modern touches include electric door-openers on the Ark, a necessity since each door weighs about 1,000 lbs. Built in 1927, the lavish Old World-style building is home to the oldest Ashkenazi congregation in the United States, which turned Reform in the 1870s. Housed in Rodeph Shalom, the Philadelphia Museum of Judaica features many items of historical and artistic interest.

Jews have figured prominently in the history of Philadelphia since long before the American Revolution. Attracted by the religious tolerance espoused by city fathers like the Quaker William Penn, many early Jews settled here, including Nathan Levy, who transported a bell from England that later became the Liberty Bell. Two centuries ago, when he wasn't flying kites or printing books or designing stoves, Benjamin Franklin helped raise funds for Mikve Israel. And Rebecca Gratz, the graceful and kind-hearted daughter of early settlers, became the model for the Jewish woman Rebecca in Walter Scott's famous novel Ivanhoe.

Today, Philadelphia is home to some 300,000 Jews, the third largest population in the United States after New York and Los Angeles. The city's Balch Institute for Ethnic Studies focuses on the history of immigration of all ethnic cultures and possesses an extensive Yiddish collection. The Rosenbach Museum and Library, the Borowsky Gallery and the Holocaust Awareness Museum of Gratz College are other institutions of note. For a thorough list of Jewish heritage sites, kosher restaurants or Jewish book and gift stores in the area, contact the Philadelphia Convention and Visitors Bureau, 1515 Market St., Suite 2020, Philadelphia PA 19102-2071. Phone (215) 636-3300.

Memorable Campaign

TORONTO — The '94 UJA campaign stands at $38.6 million with another $1.8 million worth of cards to be completed.

UJA fully expects to bring in at least $1.4 million more, and reach the campaign's $40 million goal.

Much of the success was due to the Challenge Fund which was ultimately responsible for an additional $4 million in the campaign.

Tourism Affected By Hebron?

TEL AVIV — Israeli Tourism Ministry officials and travel agents are reporting that they have already detected hesitation on the part of tourists to visit Israel, following the mass killings last week at a mosque in Hebron.

Those familiar with travel trends say the tendency to postpone plans to visit Israel is not serious yet, but that the trend may well snowball in the future.

They report that a growing number of would-be tourists are phoning friends and relations in Israel, asking them whether they should come or not.

Passover and Palm Sunday both fall this year on March 27, with Easter a week later, and the current unsettled climate in Israel has the potential to disrupt what is one of the busiest travel seasons here.

High-Flying Aviation Policy

ISRAEL — After 15 years with the same aviation policy, the Government of Israel adopted the Ministry of Tourism's recommendations for a new aviation policy for the country.

A few of the more important points of the new policy are: changing the ratio of seats from a 50/50 split between El Al and foreign carriers to a potential 60/40 ratio in favor of the foreign airlines; cancellation of the policy against mixing Israelis and tourists on charter flights as well as the policy against foreign carriers lowering prices; flexibility in allowing both charters and scheduled airlines to add flights in the high season; an annual increase in volume of seats on charter flights of not less than 25 per cent over the previous year.

These changes in the policy will allow greater competition among airlines flying to Israel and provide tourists with more routes to travel to Israel.

The changes according to Ruth Ben-Tzur, director of the Israel Government Tourist Office in Canada, will help encourage more tourists to visit Israel.

As far as Canada is concerned, these changes are a major development which will open up the whole area of charter flights from Canada to Israel and will allow scheduled carriers to compete more freely.

Proper Driver Training

TEL AVIV — Bank Hapoalim is working to protect its youthful account holders and enhance highway safety in Israel by supporting new driver training programs.

Hapoalim's project is sponsored by the National Council for the Prevention of Accidents and conducted with the co-operation of leading driving schools in Israel.

The Israeli teenagers will receive reduced rates for driver instruction, their first driver test will be given without cost, they will not have to pay for the required medical examination and the driver theory textbook will be provided free along with a disk for home study for the test.

Upon passing the test they will receive without cost, a computerized license with photograph.

Teenagers who still find it difficult to finance their driver education may receive a low interest loan of up to $1,000 for 24 months from Bank Hapoalim.

Potential Canadian investors told Israel is a 'gold mine'

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Israel is "like a gold mine" for foreign investors an international tax expert told the group of 150 people who watched a live satellite broadcast from Jerusalem recently.

"Charles Bronfman has made more money in investments in Israel than from his investments in Seagrams and Dupont," said the guest speaker, Schuyler (Skippy) Sigel, a Toronto-based international tax lawyer and a director of the Canada Israel Chamber of Commerce.

The program was divided into two parts. First, Sigel spoke on the changing business climate in Israel, the investment opportunities there and the tax breaks for Canadians. The second half was the satellite broadcast, with a seven-member Israeli panel who discussed business and job opportunities in Israel.

"Business in Israel is exploding," said Sigel. He attributed the growth to two main factors: the peace negotiations; and Operation Independence, whose aim is to make Israel economically independent of the UJA.

Foreign investment in Israel has increased with the prospect of peace. Sigel said that foreign investors are eager to set up ventures because Israel has a unique trade advantage — a free trade agreement with the United States and associate membership in the European Economic Community (EEC).

"Israel is strategically placed," said Sigel, describing Israel as "a bridge" between the duty-free American and EEC products. He went on to explain that companies open up in Israel to take advantage of free trade. Goods that are manufactured in Israel have Israeli content and thus qualify as duty free in both the United States and the EEC.

Sigel said that some American and Jewish organizations have set aside funds for business ventures in Israel through Operation Independence. As well, both the American and Canadian governments have allocated funds for joint ventures with Israel in high tech industries.

He said there is also a favorable tax climate for investment in Israel. The Canadian government gives tax breaks to companies that have ventures in Israel — the profits can be brought back to Canada tax free.

While Sigel limited his speech to foreign investment in Israel, the Jerusalem panel covered a broader range of topics. The panel, comprised of experts in various fields — health, business, technology and hospitality, was geared to providing information about job and business opportunities to those people who are considering aliyah.

The discussion was moderated by former CNN correspondent Mike Greenspan.

The Israeli Minister of Finance, Avraham Shochat, was billed as a scheduled guest, but his appearance was brief and prerecorded.

Toronto was one of 12 North American cities that participated in the telecast, which had a phone-in component. One or two people from each city were selected to ask questions about job opportunities in specific professions or about issues related to the starting up of a business. For example, in Miami one gentleman wanted to manufacture a patented invention. In Toronto, Abraham Goodman inquired about jobs in industrial sales.

Panelist Uri Scheref, an expert in small business, said the conditions for starting small businesses have improved: there are still problems with the bureaucracy, but there are fewer bottlenecks than in the past; as well inflation has gone down to 10 per cent compared to several hundred per cent a few years ago. But he warned that starting a business in Israel could be costly.

"If it takes $100,000 to start a small business in North America, it will take three times the amount in Israel," he said.

Panelist Ned Gordon, an employment expert, recommended that olim work in their fields to understand the Israeli market and mentality before starting their own businesses.

Essentially there is a demand for English-speaking professionals. The panelists indicated there were job opportunities in every vocation, but people skilled in computer technology had the most options. Proficiency in Hebrew was the recommended requirement for most professions, particularly social work, psychology, and marketing. Almost all the panelists suggested that prospective olim (immigrants) go to Israel on a pilot tour before emigrating.

Udi Svion, director of the Irael Aliyah centre in Toronto said he was pleased with the number of people that had come to watch the satellite broadcast — 70 per cent of the turnout were families scheduled to immigrate to Israel. He said immigration to Israel from Canada is up by 40 per cent — 147 people left in 1993 and 200 will be leaving this year.

Ron Friedman, a trader in high technology, attended the program to find out about investment opportunities. He said immigration to Israel is up as a result of the global recession. "People are going more for economic opportunities than idealistic reasons."

Alan and Dalya Malkow, a couple who watched the telecast, are planning to leave for Israel with their four daughters, age 5 to 15, at the end of this month. "We're going to start a new life," said Malkow. "We don't think there's a future in Canada."

The growth of foreign investment in Israel has grown steadily since 1989. Although there are no specific breakdowns that would show Canada's percentage of the overall totals, the numbers are impressive.
1889 - $440 million
1991 - $439 million

When I asked realtor Michael Kalles what he saw as the predominant trend over the next year in the real estate market, he was adamant, "First time home buyers!" Today, low interest rates and other incentives make home ownership very attainable.

The Kalles family has been selling real estate in Toronto for over 20 years. First and foremost Harvey Kalles Real Estate is a family business: Harvey, Elise, Michael and Corinne are all actively selling homes in Metro.

There is also the extended family of 55 full-time Kalles employees who specialize in every possible area of buyers' needs: first time buyers, professional appraisal and financial consulting, in house mortgage and the high-end or niche market in which Harvey Kalles Real Estate has made such a name.

Three programs which have encouraged first-time buyers and contributed greatly to an increase in consumer confidence:

1) Registered Retirement Savings Plan (RRSP) — the RRSP Home Buyer's Plan allows couples buying their first home to contribute $20,000 each, repaying the RRSP over a 15-year period tax free.

2) Ontario Home Ownership Savings Plan (OHOSP) — allows first time buyers to claim up to $2,000 a year in an OHOSP non-taxable account. (Accounts opened before 1993 will not have to pay a land transfer tax.)

3) Canadian Mortgage and Housing Corporation (CMHC) — offers qualifying, first time buyers to pay as little as 5 per cent down on homes priced up to $250,000.

Michael also says that now is the time to take advantage of the 20-year interest rate lows. When interest rates rise in the United States, as they did last week, the Canadian rate is usually only a few months behind, he adds.

Does this mean that sellers will face lower than expected resale prices? No. Sellers are not looking at diminished returns on their invesment. In fact, real estate agents are once again handling multiple offers on seller's homes, Michael says.

He adds that perhaps one of the greatest benefits of buying a house right now is that for an average rent payment, buyers can create equity for the future.

Toronto is one of the best markets for home buyers in North America. Through the multiple listing service (MLS), a computerized list of available homes, searches are executed by entering a buyer's home requirements into the MLS data base.

However, computers alone cannot run an industry. Toronto real estate agents also have to go through a three phase, two-year training program which covers such subjects as real property law, mortgage finance and appraisal.

Ontario, particularly Toronto, offers a stability not found in Montreal or the Maritimes where housing prices have fallen, nor in Vancouver which has become too inflated for most buyers.

The firm is entering into a new venture with Way Fong, the realty arm of a major Hong Kong bank. Through this connection, Harvey Kalles Real Estate will use CD-Rom technology to access markets in Hong Kong, China and Israel.

TIPS FROM PROS

TORONTO — This year Canadians faced their share of economic challenges, but paying too much 1993 tax doesn't need to be one of them.

As part of the Let's Discuss It! newsletter series, the Canadian members of Horwath International — chartered accountants Orenstein & Partners, Toronto; Appel & Partners, Montreal; and Horwath, Tierney & White, Vancouver — have prepared their 1993-94 Tax Planning for Individuals guide.

In straightforward language, the guide explains how Canadian taxpayers can make the most of tax-planning opportunities. Particular emphasis is placed on tax saving strategies for owners of companies, since Horwath clients are primarily entrepreneurs and professionals.

For year-end tax planning stories or personal finance stories throughout the year, you may find it helpful to use information directly from the guide. Here are examples of some of the tax tips contained in the enclosed booklet.

- Have family members subscribe for shares in your small business corporation. When the shares are sold, each individual may benefit from the special capital gains exemption of $500,000.
- Consider triggering the capital gains exemption by selling investments to a family member at fair market value.
- Review your portfolio to ensure that all possible allowable business investment losses have been claimed.
- Consider purchasing an "exempt" life insurance policy which allows you to accumulate cash on a tax-free basis.
- Consider using the proceeds of a company loan for investment purposes as you can deduct the benefit received from income.
- Consider buying an older company car from your employer at current fair market value as the stand-by charge is based on the original cost of the car.
- For an automobile purchase, if the funds are available, make a large down payment to ensure that the interest expense is less than $300 per month.
- Consider refurbishing expensive cars instead of buying new ones. Refurbishing, which is generally considered repairs and maintenance, is tax decutible as an operating expense.
- Ensure child care expenses are paid before the end of the year to obtain tax relief this year.
- Consider prepaying those donations in 1993 which you usually make in early 1994; prepaying donations will allow you to obtain tax benefits one year earlier.
- If you already made late or deficient tax instalment payments, consider prepaying your final instalment and possibly the final balance which is not due until April 30, 1994. These catch up payments will earn "contra-interest" and can reduce tax instalments.

Orenstein & Partners, Appel & Partners, and Horwath, Tierney & White are mid-sized accounting firms specializing in providing services to entrepreneurial clients. Horwath International is a network of 240 accounting and management consulting firms worldwide.

AGO exhibit gets $1 million gift

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — With an unprecedented million dollar contribution, the investment management firm of Gluskin Sheff & Associates has become the exclusive corporate sponsor of the Art Gallery of Ontario's upcoming exhibition, From Cezanne to Matisse: Great French Paintings from The Barnes Foundation.

Gerald Sheff, chair and CEO of Gluskin Sheff, and a past chair of the United Jewish Appeal, made the announcement of the gift, the largest ever by a private company in support of a cultural event in Canada, at a recent press conference held at the gallery.

Sheff said the firm had been looking for a way to celebrate its 10th anniversary, and the opportunity to sponsor the Barnes exhibition just fell into their laps. "We were approached by the gallery to be one of three corporate sponsors. Right away we realized the inredible opportunity of associating our firm with an exhibition of such stunning quality."

After a five-minute meeting with Ira Gluskin, president and chief investment officer of Gluskin Sheff, Sheff telephoned Glenn Lowry, the director of the Art Gallery of Ontario (AGO). Sheff asked Lowry if the gallery would consider Gluskin Sheff as the exclusive corporate sponsor, an offer the gallery accepted in a matter of days.

According to Joseph Rotman, president of the gallery's board of trustees, Gluskin and Sheff made the decision to give more sponsorship money than the gallery had asked for. "That is very unique," he said.

Sheff said the arts have seen their funding seriously eroded. He said he and Gluskin hoped that the sponsorship of the Barnes exhibition by a small Canadian company with only 25 employees would send a strong signal to the business community. "It's not just the corporate giants and the multinationals who can stand up and be counted as patrons of the arts. We know that there are many more Canadian companies who are in a position to do much more. They have the money. What they don't have is a genuine understanding of just how big a difference their contribution can make and how vital Canada's cultural community is to Canada's future."

The president of the Council for Business and the Arts in Canada, an organization that represents the interests of the largest Canadian corporate supporters of the arts, stressed that it takes companies with vision and dedication as well as ones with deep pockets to sponsor an exhibition like the Barnes. "While there are many companies in this country that have the deep pockets, there are only a handful with the vision to take such a step," said Blair Mascall.

From Cezanne to Matisse: Great French Paintings from The Barnes Foundation can be seen at the AGO from September 17 to December 31. Tickets go on sale on April 18.

Survivors' children speak at York Holocaust program

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — This year's Holocaust Education Week at York University may turn out to be the starting point for other campus projects related to Holocaust education. The Jewish Student Federation's anti-Semitism committee, which organized the week's events, is now planning to establish a separate Holocaust task force.

Toronto architect and urban planner Ann Milchberg, speaking at one event, paid poignant tribute to the grandparents she never met and urged students to take action to prevent a repetition of history. Milchberg was one of three children of Holocaust survivors featured in Return to the Warsaw Ghetto, a documentary produced last year by award-winning journalist Steve Paikin of TV Ontario. Paikin is well known as a former CBC television anchor and reporter.

The documentary, which incorporates stark Nazi footage, follows three survivors and their children who travelled to Poland from Canada last year for the 50th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising.

Milchberg, along with Michael Zajdman and Louis Fields, the two other children of survivors featured in the documentary, spoke to York students on How Will the Next Generations Continue the Lesson? The previous day's program had consisted of a screening of Return to the Warsaw Ghetto and a discussion with Paikin.

For Milchberg, the trip to Poland "made everything tangible." She grieved for a month after returning from Poland, she said in the film.

"You have to find some way of making it personal to you," she told the students, strongly urging them to travel to eastern and western Europe, in small groups with a survivor if they could. The speakers agreed that being with a group was comforting and therapeutic. "The place gets to you," said Milchberg. "Our grandparents are still kind of there. The earth is soaked with their blood."

Milchberg's brother had suggested that perhaps groups of students could survey and catalogue the headstones of badly neglected Jewish cemeteries such as the one in Warsaw, she noted.

Paikin had told the students that synagogue renovations in Krakow were not completed because money had run out. "Poland is a very poor country," he said.

Milchberg stressed the importance of focusing on the rich tapestry of Jewish life that preceded the Holocaust. "I think my grandparents would have wanted to know that they weren't defined by their deaths," she said. "[The Jewish community] lived for hundreds of years in a rich cultural milieu.

"I think my grandparents would have wanted you to know what led to their demise was lack of value for human life," Milchberg said. "I think students must expose and excise these tumors. You should never forget that the fighters in the Warsaw Ghetto were your age. They brought some measure of dignity to our people. You can do the same."

Fields, a Toronto physician, also urged students to "get involved" to ensure the future of Judaism. "We can survive as a nation only if we maintain our Jewish identity," he said, noting that Israel and belief in God are key elements. He added that Jews must live in the secular world and "rely on our own actions.

"We must educate ourselves, our children, our fellow Jews, the world — or else, as we know too well, history will repeat itself."

In the film, Fields paid tribute to his parents, who attended the session at which he spoke. "It's amazing that they're so good, so rational, so reasonable, given the reality that was theirs for five or six years."

Zajdman, a Mississauga pediatrician, noted parallels with modern-day young victims of war and terrorism who have been torn from their parents and seen people killed.

He urged students to speak out against prejudice "even in the smallest form. JAP jokes...are important to take a stand on," he said. "To a large extent they contribute to people accepting thinking less of other people and doing things they wouldn't do otherwise."

Zajdman spoke of the importance of accurate information for those seeking to educate others. "You don't have instant credibility [because you weren't there]," he said. "You have to be very precise in terms of knowing the historical facts. You make a mistake, and it casts a doubt on everything you say."

Zajdman's mother was saved by a Polish Catholic who also appeared in the TVO documentary. More than 3,000 Poles risked their lives by hiding Jews, it was noted in the film.

"I am astounded at the courage of the people who decided to go back [to Poland]," said Paikin. "They are extraordinarily gutsy, not just to confront the demons for themselves but to allow us to eavesdrop. They're truly great people."

IT'S A BIRD, IT'S A PLANE, IT'S . . .

One of the more unusual attractions in Eilat is the Airodium. Those hardy people who want to go against nature can put on a special suit and headgear and thrust themselves into the air stream of a giant fan. The stream of air can project you many metres up into the air if you know how to hold your body against the airflow. The Airodium is also used by people who want to train as skydivers or just want to be like a bird for a minute or two. There are only five such similar facilities in the world. [ISRAET photo]

Israeli cabinet bans Kach, Kahane Chai

Staff/CJN Wire Services

JERUSALEM — Using regulations that previously had been employed only against Palestinians, the Israeli government has banned the extremist Kach and Kahane Chai political parties.

Israel's cabinet voted unanimously last Sunday to outlaw the two groups, declaring them terrorist organizations.

Immediately following the ban, the two principal Kach leaders, Baruch Marzel and Noam Federman, were indicted. Marzel, who remained at large, was quoted by Israel Radio as saying from his hiding place, "I will not stop acting for one day. Just like we got past Stalin, we can get past [Prime Minister Yitzhak] Rabin."

And the leader of Kahane Chai, Benjamin Ze'ev Kahane, son of the late Rabbi Meir Kahane, was jailed last Thursday for nine months for an attack on Israeli police and participation in an illegal gathering in 1991, Israel's Itim news agency said.

Reports said Rabin wanted the groups banned before his meeting this week in Washington with U.S. President Bill Clinton, and as a way to cool anger among Palestinians, still seething over the Feb. 25 mosque attack by Kach follower Baruch Goldstein.

According to Attorney-General Michael Ben-Yair, the two groups will from now on be treated in the same way as Hezbollah, Islamic Jihad, Hamas and other terror organizations.

It is now an offence for members of the public to donate money to the groups, or provide them with goods or a meeting place. It is now also illegal to display their symbol, keep their literature or show support for them in any way.

Offenders could face prison terms of up to three years, while Kach and Kahane Chai members can be imprisoned for up to five years and their leaders up to 20 years.

According to the Isranet news service, the Jerusalem offices of both groups are expected to be forcibly closed and up to 60 activists may be detained.

Israel radio reported that immigration officials were examining whether the measures could allow them to deny Kach disciples from North America permission to immigrate to Israel.

In related developments, Rabin said Sunday that the government has sole and full responsibility for the security of the entire population of Israel and the territories, without distinction between Jew and Palestinian.

And in a similar vein, the Israel Defence Force issued what it termed a clarification of its open-fire instructions.

Under the terms of the new instructions, Israeli soldiers were clearly told to take all measures — including opening fire — against anyone, including settlers, who fires at others in a situation that is clearly not self-defence.

Rabin's statement and the IDF clarification came on the heels of the furor caused throughout the country when the commander of the border police in Hebron told the commission investigating the Feb. 25 Hebron killings that Israeli soldiers had standing orders never to fire upon Jews.

In outlawing the two Jewish groups, the cabinet employed a decades-old law that had been aimed at Palestinian terror groups.

Kach and Kahane Chai owe their ideology to the fiercely anti-Arab teachings of the late Rabbi Meir Kahane, who founded Kach and the Jewish Defence League and was assassinated in New York in 1990.

Kahane Chai was founded by Benjamin Kahane following his father's murder.

Immediately after the cabinet decision, representatives of Kach said they would appeal the ban to the Supreme Court. but in the meantime, indicated they would suspend all activities. Some supporters said they would be simply driven underground.

Pogrom deadline passes in Syria

All quiet in Jewish quarters

By PAUL LUNGEN and RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporters

TORONTO — A pogrom threatened against Syria's remaining 1,050 Jews did not take place last Sunday, after Canada received assurances from Syrian officials that Jews would be protected.

All was quiet in the Jewish quarters of Damascus, Aleppo and Qumishli, where Jews feared violence from a shadowy group called the Syrian Muslim Party of Justice, which threatened to take revenge for last month's mosque massacre in Hebron. [CJN, March 10]

Letters sent to every Jewish home and business in the country said the "blood of all Jews living in Syria" would be spilled March 13, which marked the end of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan. "You will see that Hitler was weak in comparison to what we will do to you," the letters warned.

Canada's ambassador to Syria, John McNee, received assurances from officials in the foreign ministry that Jews would be protected from violence. Ottawa's move was a formal step, referred to in diplomatic parlance as a demarche.

According to Judy Feld Carr, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress's National Task Force for Syrian Jews, 53 Jews came out of Syria on last Sunday night's flight.

The number last week was 42, leaving roughly over 1,000 Jews remaining in the country.

Carr said hundreds of faxes and letters were sent to Foreign Minister Andre Ouellet by students, task force members and the community at large, asking for Canada's help.

While Carr said she was thankful for Canada's intercession, she called on Ottawa to raise the matter of issuing exit visas to those Jews who have been denied the documents.

Nearly all Syrian Jews have exit permits but Carr says authorities have been splitting families, with many children being denied papers.

* * *

The Syrian government "would have [had] to be damn fools if they let one Jew die" in the pogrom, Carr told a national executive meeting of Canadian Jewish Congress was told last weekend.

In addition to Canada, Carr said the American, Australian and Mexican embassies interceded with the Syrian government, calling on it to prevent any bloodshed.

Reports from Syria indicate a heavier presence than usual of secret police in the Jewish quarters in three cities, she said.

Despite widespread fear in the Jewish community, the whole emergency situation might have be a cynical maneuvre by Syria's leadership, she suggested.

She said it's "impossible" to believe that the letters threatening to kill Jews were distributed without the knowledge of the secret police and government.

Despite that assessment, she said Syrian Jews are "panic-stricken" over threats posed by the fundamentalists, and they are trying to leave the country as soon as possible.

Canada issues travel advisory

OTTAWA — The Ministry of Foreign Affairs has issued a travel advisory recommending Canadians "defer travel for the time being to Israeli-occupied areas in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, including east Jerusalem.

"Canadians should exercise caution, be aware of their surroundings and avoid crowds and demonstrations when travelling in the region," the ministry suggests.

The advisory was issued in the wake of last's month's Hebron mosque attack. An earlier advisory, that included a warning not to visit Nazareth, was cancelled after only a few hours.

Meanwhile, the United States issued a travel warning to Americans, suggesting they not enter east Jerusalem, the West Bank or the Gaza Strip. In the immediate aftermath of the Hebron massacre, in which Baruch Goldstein shot 30 Palestinian worshippers, the U.S. State Department's warning encompassed areas inside the Green Line, including Jaffa, Nazareth and parts of the Negev where violent protest demonstrations erupted.

A subsequent advisory deleted reference to areas inside Israel's pre-1967 borders.

NCJW prepares to deliver Passover parcels

Grade 8 students of Ruth Yablonsky (not in photo) from Associated Hebrew Schools, Leslie Branch, help sort and pack Passover food for National Council of Jewish Women's Passover project.

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — This Sunday morning a small army of volunteers will arrive at National Council of Jewish Women's (NCJW) Bathurst Street offices to pick up and deliver 2,500 boxes filled with Passover necessities including wine, candles and matzoh.

The list of about 1,700 recipients (families get two or three boxes) consists of new immigrants and others on fixed incomes throughout Metro Toronto and just beyond its boundaries.

The NCJW Toronto section project, now in its ninth year, began with the delivery of 300 boxes.

"We do this to help people celebrate Passover with dignity," NCJW Toronto section president Gita Arnold told The CJN in an interview last week.

Arnold draws a distinction between the Passover project and a food drive. "We are not giving them food to get through the week. We are giving people food to celebrate a religious holiday."

For many immigrants, the Passover gift box is an important component in celebrating their first Pesach in Canada. For some, it is their first introduction to Passover food.

The basic box for a single recipient includes gefilte fish, chicken soup, wine, matzoh, jam, juice or borscht, two desserts, and tea or coffee. Candles and a haggadah (in Russian for the Russian recipients) are also included. Recipients also get a frozen chicken donated by Chai Kosher Poultry.

The entire project is a community effort, noted Arnold. In addition to JIAS and JF&CS, the Board of Jewish Education (BJE) is involved by informing synagogues and BJE-affiliated schools of the need for donations, and sending students to help with the project. The Oshawa Group supplied paper bag inserts in the Feb. 24 CJN for readers' contributions, and Canadian Jewish Congress' Moess Chittin Campaign contributed $15,000 to supplement the food donations.

Members of Council, schoolchildren, and immigrants taking English as a Second Language in the building are among those who have helped put boxes together and sort and pack the donated food. "It's a big job," says Arnold.

Any food which cannot be used for the project, such as food that isn't kosher for Passover, is donated to the North York Food Harvest.

"We're desperate for donations," Arnold told The CJN last week. She attributes their need to the recession and to Passover being early this year (the first seder is March 26). Volunteers, especially drivers, are always needed, she added.

"We are adamant about doing the best job we can," Arnold said. "We're very proud to do this."

Anyone who would like to help should call the NCJW office at 416-633-5100.

Students hold separate vigils

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — In the wake of the Hebron massacre, Jewish and pro-Palestinian students staged separate but simultaneous and peaceful vigils just metres apart at McGill University

Thirty minutes after about 25 Palestinian students had gathered under a blue, cold sky to hold their silent vigil on the steps of the university's union building, a group of about 150 Jewish students lit candles and called for an end to all terrorism, against Arabs and Jews alike.

The Palestinian students, holding placards equating Zionism with racism and calling for Israel to "outlaw Jewish fanatics," stood silently throughout. There was no contact between the two sides.

At one point police asked the Jewish students to cross the street to minimize the risk of contact between the groups.

"We are here with our Palestinian cousins because we are motivated by the same event," said Rabbi Reuben Poupko of the Beth Israel Beth Aaron Synagogue.

"There is no question that we find some of the [Palestinians'] signs disturbing. But we have come to proclaim a stand opposed to murder and terrorism.

"Victims need to be named whether they are Arab or Jewish, and we would hope that Palestinians one day will also be able to come out and denounce the murder of Jews," he said.

Howard Liebman, president of Tagar, which co-ordinated the rally and Ilan Gewurtz, a Jewish activist at McGill, echoed those sentiments.

"We are here in our silence to stand up and be counted," Liebman said, as the crowd held up a large Israeli flag and placards with messages like, "100 percent Zionist and proud."

Gewurtz said the vigil was meant to "mourn and commemorate" the victims of all terror.

Liebman told The CJN that Tagar organized the rally with only a day's notice when it learned of the plans for the Palestinian vigil and, he indicated, to counter the upsurge in pro-Palestinian activity on campuses, especially at McGill and Concordia universities.

According to Mark Zarecki, director of the Hillel-Jewish Student Centre, Palestinian students at Concordia's downtown campus set up a "particularly nasty" display in the Hall Building's mezzanine level earlier that week.

Zarecki said one of the signs the Palestinian students put up said, "following in Hitler's footsteps," which triggered angry verbal exchanges with Jewish students.

Zarecki said this prompted the administration to summon the police to prevent the confrontation from escalating into violence.

After Jewish students complained about the sign, Zarecki said, the Concordia University Student Association (CUSA) convinced the Palestinian students to alter the wording.

While Zarecki said the situation has been more tranquil at McGill, Liebman said Jewish students have been "harassed" as they walked through the Union Building, where Palestinian students had put on their own display condemning the massacre.

The massacre has also been the subject for much coverage in the campus newspaper, The McGill Daily. But Zarecki indicated the newspaper's general anti-Israel tone has not seemed to be as vitriolic as in the past and that space has also been provided for "Jewish" views.

Rami Dajani, the leader of McGill's Palestinian Solidarity Committee (PSC), told The CJN that the message his group wanted to send was that the Hebron massacre was not "merely an act of a lunatic.

"It was a conscious act of terrorism" and the inevitable culmination of a long-term Israeli policy to expand and maintain settlements, to furnish settlers with arms, and not take action as extremist fervor grew.

Dajani said settlers must no longer be allowed to bear arms. "It's not a question of politics, it is a question of security."

As well, Dajani said Palestinians would like to see Israel start to dismantle settlements now, even though the Israel-PLO accord stipulates the issue to be negotiated at a later phase of its implementation.

But considering the threat to public security Palestinians feel the settlements pose, "the spirit, not the letter [of the accord], calls for their dismantling," Dajani said.

Wilson to be honored

TORONTO — Former Supreme Court Justice Bertha Wilson will be honored with the Special Human Rights Award at the 19th Annual Media Human Rights Awards on March 21 at the Sheraton Centre in Toronto.

The award is presented by the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada for lifetime commitment to the promotion of human rights.

Wilson, currently the chair of the Canadian Bar Association's task force on women and a member of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, has a long record of championing human rights.

Israeli, PLO representatives debate need for Mideast peace

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel's army will disarm extremist Jewish settlers and even put them under administrative detention in order to get peace talks back on track, the Jewish state's ambassador to Canada said here last week.

But those policies are too little, too late; what's needed now is nothing less than a complete change in Israel's attitude toward Palestinians, countered a former PLO representative to Canada.

The Feb. 25 massacre in Hebron of 30 Palestinians by Jewish settler Baruch Goldstein was the main focus, although unintended, of a spirited debate between Itzhak Shelef and Abdullah Abdullah, who represented the PLO in this country from 1972 to 1990.

The two diplomats addressed some 500 students at the University of Toronto's Scarborough campus, in the annual Watts Memorial Lecture. Security was a visible concern, with over a dozen uniformed Metro police on hand, along with several undercover officers.

The two men had been lined up for the lecture well before events in Hebron, which took over the evening, but not before Shelef and Abdullah began with an extended handshake greeted with wide applause.

The mosque murders must not be allowed to block continuing efforts toward peace, said Shelef. The need to break through "encrusted" layers of mistrust and hatred is needed, but equally important is the need for both sides to "negotiate" with their own constituents, he added.

Normally, peace agreements separate two sides, but the Declaration of Principles, in which Israel and the PLO recognized each other, and the self-rule accord signed last autumn are designed to bring Jews and Palestinians together, Shelef said.

"We have to learn to live together. We can separate from war but not from each other."

Israel has taken extraordinary steps following the Hebron incident, he pointed out: the Knesset and Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin condemned the act, a public inquiry is being held and the army is cracking down on Jewish extremists in the territories.

"We recognize the anger of Palestinians in the wake of Hebron but the Palestinian leadership must be sensitive to the needs and fears of Israelis," Shelef said, adding that the "vast majority" of Israelis are still willing to take risks for peace.

The Declaration of Principles are "still not implementable," but the most sensitive hurdles have been overcome, he pointed out.

"We must resume negotiations. We must not surrender to extremists on both sides."

Abdullah, now the ambassador of Palestine to Greece, where Palestine has diplomatic status, countered that "the whole structure" of negotiations must be changed because of Hebron.

Terming Jewish settlements "illegal" and a "threat to peace," he said there will be "no business as usual" in peace talks.

He accused Israel of "delaying tactics" in implementing the Declaration of Principles by not setting concrete dates.

Months ago, a cable was sent from Arab leaders in Hebron to Rabin, complaining of the behavior of several Jewish settlers, including Baruch Goldstein. "Nothing was done," Abdullah charged.

He said Israel showed "a lack of a serious response before, during and after" the Hebron incident, and charged that several of the dead were likely gunned down by Israeli soldiers guarding the mosque.

Abdullah said 35 Palestinians have been killed in clashes with Israeli security forces since the massacre and he called on Israel to treat Jewish extremists the same way it treats Muslim radicals.

Palestinians and Jews can live side-by-side but not mixed together, he said.

In his rebuttal, Shelef said Israel knows Jewish settlements are "a problem," but that the longer the two sides wait to resume talks, the harder they will be.

Jewish settlers were originally armed by the Israeli army in order to defend themselves from Muslim extremists, he noted. Now, the same army will take those weapons away and even hold Jews in detention.

Shelef said 30 Jews have been killed in terrorist incidents in Israel since the Declaration of Principles was signed.

Catholic kids miss Holocaust film

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A total of 372 students from outlying towns in northern Alberta attended a special screening of Schindler's List in Edmonton, but a Catholic survivor of Auschwitz who arranged it is sad that 150 Catholic students who were invited did not show up.

Sigmund Sobolewski claims that the Leduc Separate School Board cancelled plans for a field trip by 40 students because of the film's content, but Ken Dick, its superintendent, said he was not given enough notice to get parental consent. Dick told The CJN he was informed only the day before a decision had to be made, but Sobolewski said the board had a week's notice. The teacher at Christ the King High School in Leduc whose students were to attend, did not return a call from The CJN.

Dick said he did call the superintendent of a neighboring separate school board who had seen the film twice, once with his wife, and that official's advice was that students should not see the film without their parents' consent.

A news release issued by Sobolewski "misrepresented" the position of the Leduc Board in stating that it had boycotted the film, Dick said.

The students who saw Schindler's List came from 14 different high schools in northern Alberta, the buses paid for by the public school boards involved. One busload came from Fox Creek, 300 kilometres away.

"Most of these students had never seen a Jew before," Sobolewski said. "Many were crying when they came out of the film."

Dressed in the prison uniform he wore at Auschwitz, Sobolewski handed out leaflets to the students calling the screening a "Christian venture of solidarity with Jews."

The students were addressed briefly by Rev. Clark Saunders, of Knox Metropolitan United Church, Rev. Keith Bishop of Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada, Rosalyn Zdunich, a lay person, and Rabbi Jacob Rosner, Beth Sholom Synagogue, Edmonton.

York Region school board may start classes on Sept. 6

Recommendation for delay ignored by committee

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Some public school boards in Canada, at least those in urban areas, appear to be accommodating Jewish students and staff by not starting the next academic year on Sept. 6 — the first day of Rosh Hashanah.

But a key subcommittee of the country's fastest growing board has decided to disregard a recommendation to delay the start of the 1994-1995 year, and says classes should start Sept. 6.

The school calendar committee of the York Region Board of Education, encompassing the booming areas north of Toronto, where many young Jewish families have moved in the last decade, this month voted to begin school Sept. 6, thus apparently not paying heed to a board race relations report, which said starting classes that day could prove to be "extremely disruptive" to Jewish pupils and staff.

The committee voted nine to six to begin classes Sept. 6. Four Jewish trustees, and two non-Jewish ones, voted to delay the first day of school to Sept. 8.

Trustee Susan Kadis, who had co-sponsored the resolution to delay classes, called the vote "very unfortunate" and insensitive.

"It was the first real test of our race relations policy, and we failed," she added. "They haven't been able to come up with one reason why the year shouldn't start on Sept. 8."

The decision is not final, however. The committee's recommendation will go to a vote by all 20 board trustees March 29. But Kadis feels the board will accept the suggestion to begin classes Sept. 6.

Kadis said the calendar committee did not even refer to an earlier report prepared by the board's race relations advisory committee, which concluded that Jewish students and staff "would find the tide of first-day events has passed them by and left them ill-prepared" should the year begin Sept. 6.

"Staff, students and parents of the Jewish faith would be placed in a position of choosing between their faith and attending school" if classes are held on the 6th and 7th, the 14-page study stated.

"Shame on York Region," remarked Bernie Farber of Canadian Jewish Congress. He said a CJC delegation will speak to board members March 28 "to let them know how concerned and upset we are at how little faith they have put in their own race relations committee."

The school year customarily begins the first weekday after Labor Day. But due to this year's early High Holidays, CJC and B'nai Brith Canada have been urging some public boards not to hold classes on Rosh Hashanah — Sept. 6 and 7 — because missing the first two days of school would place Jewish students at an unfair disadvantage.

The CJN's calls to York Region calendar committee chair Terry Gray were not returned by press time.

Across Canada, there have been the following developments:

• In the Maritimes, Jewish numbers are too small to ask school boards to postpone the start of the academic year, says the Atlantic Jewish Council's Jon Goldberg. The AJC has instead mailed letters to boards across the Maritimes, asking schools and teachers to show "consideration and sensitivity" to Jewish students, who would miss the first two days of the year.

• A decision on when to begin the next school year at the Protestant School Board of Greater Montreal, in whose schools most Jewish children in the city's public system are enrolled, will be taken at the end of March, a spokeswoman said.

• The Ottawa and Carleton boards of education are waiting to see which decision Metro Toronto boards take before submitting their calendars for 1994-1995, says community relations director Ruth Kahane. She said the boards have "very tentatively" considered starting the year Sept. 8. "They are taking the issue very seriously," she added.

• At the Toronto Board of Education, one of Canada's largest, it's "quite certain" classes will start Sept. 8, a spokeswoman said. A recommendation to that effect will be debated at month's end.

• At the North York Board of Education, with its heavy Jewish enrolment and staff, it's "almost 100 per cent certain" the academic year will begin Sept. 8, board chair Shelley Stillman told The CJN.

"This is an issue of sensitivity," she said. Stillman pointed out that starting the year two days later than normal would still leave the board with 193 school days — within provincial requirements — eight of those as Professional Activity (PA) days, one less than had been planned.

• In Manitoba, classes are scheduled to get underway in late August, as has been the norm in recent years. However, the University of Manitoba has agreed to delay the start of its year until after Rosh Hashanah, in response to requests from Jewish students, staff and the community at large.

• In Calgary, the lone public board will start the next academic year Aug. 31. According to Riki Heilik of the local CJC office, the board was "very careful" to state that it was not beginning the year earlier than usual to accommodate Jewish students. Heilik is nonetheless "happy" there will be no conflict for Jewish students and staff this autumn.

• In Edmonton, the academic year will start Aug. 29. Gayle Tallman of the community relations committee said board trustees had been informed of the potential conflict with Rosh Hashanah.

• In British Columbia, CJC Pacific region and Vancouver's B'nai Brith-Hillel have sent letters to the education ministry, colleges, universities and public boards, asking that allowances be made for Jewish staff and students. While the University of British Columbia turned down the request to begin after Rosh Hashahah, it is looking into developing a policy on non-statutory religious holidays, reports The Jewish Western Bulletin.

Journalist says Hebron attack counter-productive to settlers

By DEBORAH LIGHTSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The killing of at least 30 Palestinians praying at a Hebron mosque was a horrifying act that even opponents of the Israel-PLO peace accord will realize is counter-productive to their cause, says a well-known Israeli journalist and author.

Yossi Melman is a correspondent for the Israeli daily Ha'aretz and has written several books, the best-known (co-authored with Dan Raviv) being Every Prince A Spy, a history of Israel's intelligence agencies. He has also written books on the Palestinian uprisings and on Arab terrorist organizations.

The Melman lecture was organized by the New Leadership of Beit Halochem Canada, with the proceeds to be used to equip the new rehabilitation and recreation centre for disabled Israeli war veterans in Jerusalem.

"As a Jew I am ashamed of what happened . . . that an Israeli, a doctor, a husband, a father of four could do this . . . there cannot be an explanation or a justification for it," Melman said in the talk given two days after the massacre.

"There are agreed parameters and rules shared by the supporters and by the opponents of the peace accord. This act broke those parameters; it was beyond the pale. And even those who oppose the Israeli government will realize it is counter-productive to the settlers' cause," Melman said.

"The result will be a call for the international community to send observers, like in Bosnia. If the territories destabilize, explode, get to the point of a wild west or a no-man's land, the international community will be under pressure to send observers or even troops, because Israel will be seen as unable to provide protection for civilians. The question will be: 'Why in Sarajevo and not in Hebron?' "

On a more optimistic note, Melman suggested that the massacre in Hebron might serve as a bitter catalyst, just as the recent bloody shelling of the marketplace in Sarajevo moved NATO nations to try and halt the vicious killing there by forcing Serbian troops to withdraw their big guns from around the city.

"Maybe both sides will realize there is no alternative to peace other than continued killing and escalation of violence. The PLO knows it, and after tempers cool down and the situation stabilizes, I think the negotiations will continue," he said.

Melman's area of expertise in Israeli affairs is defence and espionage. In his talk he pointed out the often contradictory paths Israel must take on the road to peace.

Contradictory paths to peace

On one hand, he said, Israel's security services continue to monitor and infiltrate Palestinian groups in order to find out their intentions.

"But Israel must also negotiate implementation of the peace agreement, which means more co-operation with the Palestinians. Already there are 'war rooms' set up in the West Bank and Gaza to co-ordinate PLO and Israeli security, to answer questions on the ground, such as how to guard the roads to Jewish settlements," Melman said.

As well, even before the signing of the accord, Israeli security services provided advice and assistance in protecting moderate leaders of the PLO who received threats from radical Muslim groups like Hamas.

For example, he said, Israeli security forces turned a blind eye when key PLO negotiator Faisal Husseini used armed boduguards, which is normally not permitted.

Melman recounted a particularly ironic turn of events. He noted that the Israeli negotiating delegation dealing with security is headed by a former intelligence officer who led a commando raid against the PLO in Beirut, in which three prominent PLO leaders were killed. Twenty-two years later, Melman said, that former commando leader was sitting at the negotiating table with a Palestinian delegation led by one of the targets of the attack, who had managed to escape.

Asked about how the Hebron massacre would affect Yasser Arafat's standing, Melman said the PLO chairman's power has been undermined since he signed the peace accord last September.

"He is challenged both inside and outside his own camp. If he backs out of the agreement, if he does not continue the talks, he is finished . . . he may be finished even if he does continue . . . but he cannot go back. He has changed his colors, he cannot reinvent himself as a guerrilla terrorist leader. He's in a no-win situation unless the peace agreement is workable, and soon."

Finally, when asked why he is optimistic, in spite of all the complexities and obstacles involved in the peace process, Melman gave the typically Israeli pragmatic reply: "What is the alternative?

"The majority of Israelis are tired of war. We want to see a change. There are other issues on our agenda besides security and territories and settlements. We want to lead a normal life just as you do in Toronto.

"There are risks in the peace agreement but the chance is worth taking because the alternative . . . Israel being a besieged fortress forever . . . is worse. If the peace agreement fails, at least we can look into the eyes of our kids and say: we tried."

Former PoW Lavy joins Winnipeg student rally

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Praries Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For 45 days in 1973, Arie Lavy was a prisoner of war (PoW) in Egypt. Listed as missing in action in the early days of the Yom Kippur War and presumed dead, Lavy says that his family only found out that he was alive a few hours before he came back home.

Because he has been there, Lavy, now a Winnipeg computer consultant, can well identify with Ron Arad, Zacharia Baumel, Zvi Feldman and Yehuda Katz, Israeli soldiers listed as missing in action (MIAs), and their families.

On March 8, Lavy joined members of the National Student Coalition for Israeli MIAs, provincial politicians and Jewish community leaders at a rally on the steps of the Manitoba Legislature to call on the Canadian and American governments to press Syria and Iran for information about the four MIAs.

"It is not nice being an Israeli PoW in an Arab country," Lavy said. "The former American hostages in Lebanon can tell their stories, too. For the government of Israel, it is difficult politically to be negotiating with terrorists."

As Lori Binder, Network's western resource person and rally co-chair, outlined, Baumel, Feldman and Katz were captured by Syrian forces in a tank battle in Lebanon in June 1982. They were reported to have been paraded through the streets of Damascus. A year later, there was an elaborate funeral for four Israelis in Damascus. When the coffins were returned to Israel however, three were empty. In 1988, Amnesty International received reports they were still alive in 1987. Their whereabouts are unknown.

Ron Arad was shot down over Lebanon in 1986 and captured by Hezbollah guerillas. It is believed he is still being held by Iranian Revolutionary Guards in a village in Lebanon.

Lavy became aware of the plight of the MIAs and two others, Joseph Fink and Rahamim Levi Alsheikh (also kidnapped in Lebanon in 1986), while on a visit to his family in Tel Aviv in December. As a former PoW, he sought information on the six men. He met with student leaders at Tel Aviv University who are campaigning to increase public awareness of the situation and offered his help.

"We hope they are still alive," he says. "The real issue is that their families need to know whether they are living or dead so they can go on with their lives."

Lavy returned from Israel with a videotape of interviews with the families. He has made the tape available to the National Student Coalition for Israeli MIAs.

Also addressing the rally were: Linda MacIntosh, minister of Urban Affairs; NDP MLA Harry Schellenberg; Michael Lazar, chair of the Midwest region of the B'nai Brith League for Human Rights; and Ali Zentner, a University of Winnipeg student who had just completed a 24 hour hunger strike to publicize the MIAs plight.

Goldstein gets Israel Bonds post

TORONTO — Ruchama Goldstein is the first Canadian to chair the North American Women's Division of State of Israel Bonds.

From her Toronto headquarters, Goldstein will oversee women's divisions in cities across Canada and the United States.

Born in Israel, Goldstein came to Toronto 26 years ago when her father, Abba Geffen, was Israel's consul general. When his tour of duty ended, she remained and began her involvement with Israel Bonds.

Goldstein's goal is to re-awaken dormant women's divisions and energize the weaker ones.

Ottawa, Montreal and Hamilton, she says, are strong, but Toronto could be more active.

Goldstein and her colleagues have developed several programs to draw women into the Bonds investment community.

One of them, called Prime Time, is a North American speakers' bureau, which will supply experts to address women on topical Jewish issues such as the Holocaust, anti-Semitism and Israel. A bar and bat mitzvah promotion encourages the purchase of Bonds for special occasions, and attractive pins are given to women who invest $1,500 or more.

Ruchama Goldstein

Again this year, Bonds proceeds will be used by Israel to finance absorption and employment requirements for new immigrants. But, for Golstein there's something "very special," about the way in which Bonds contribute to the country.

"It's not a charity donation, it's an investment, a loan, and there's dignity attached to lending."

Although Israel's need for Bond dollars applies to both genders, Goldstein believes that investments by women produce "a certain sense of pride and set a family example that is conveyed to the children."

Last year, North American women purchased $50 million dollars worth of Israel Bonds.

CJC to celebrate 75th anniversary

Leaders gathering in Montreal for kick-off

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Some 300 leaders from Canada's Jewish community are gathered here at the Monument National to kick off the 75th anniversary year of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), giving celebrants pause to reflect on how the national representative organization of Canadian Jewry has changed since 1919.

But also, in a sense, how nothing has changed at all.

As the invitees prepared to fete "the Parliament of Canadian Jewry" March 16 at the refurbished Monument National on venerable St. Lawrence Boulevard — the same date and location of CJC's first plenary assembly — Irving Abella, CJC's 13th president, hailed the progress achieved by the Canadian Jewish community in affirming its rightful place within Canadian society.

CJC will celebrate the year on a national scale with anniversary events planned for all of CJC's regions.

Abella said the CJC has stayed true to its founding vision and it remains "the only democratically-elected Jewish body in the Diaspora."

At the very first assembly (and every assembly since) the 200 delegates who packed into the Monument National vigorously tackled the issues of the day — and the discourse did not necessarily follow Roberts Rules of Procedure.

Then, as today, debates were often marked by heated and heartfelt exchanges and by contentious resolutions that have always been a traditional and healthy part of CJC's democratic and dynamic decision-making process.

Is rapprochement new? Well, even in 1919, according to H.M. Caiserman's The Jews in Canada, Congress delegates attended a reception at Montreal City Hall where "a large Jewish flag was overhanging the mayor's chair."

The acting mayor declared "that the Jewish element in this cosmopolitan city was highly respected both by the Roman Catholics and the Protestant population."

How about minority language rights?

At the inaugural plenary delegate S. Belkin put forward a motion that Canada, "being a bilingual country where national rights are recognized for minorities," should seek "such rights for the Jewish people" including a "separate school panel in the Province of Quebec."

And women's involvement in the community? The Gazette gave extensive coverage to the plenary, noting that the "delegates included women," albeit with the somewhat patronizing comment that "one made her voice heard several times."

* * *

So if Congress has always been topical, what, then, has changed?

In Abella's mind, it is the community itself, and by extension, Congress.

The Canadian Jewish community of 350,000, Abella said, is less "parochial" in its outlook, is more self-assured and wields more economic and political clout than it did 75 years ago.

It is also a community, he added, that is much more woven into the fabric of Canadian life.

Abella said it is now a community with the ability to "form coalitions" but also one which, regrettably, must still wage war against the forces of intolerance.

In his view, the major issue today is Jewish continuity.

But the organization also has to think of strategies to prevent it from losing touch with its consitutents.

On the one hand, Abella says, CJC is "more representative than any other international Jewish organization," open to the participation of any member of the Canadian Jewish community.

But on the other, given the organization's much greater size than in 1919, "it is much harder to get your voice heard," not so much at the regional as at the national level.

* * *

Irving Abella

An overview of CJC's history reveals an organization very much caught up in, and occasionally submerged by the tides of history.

At its birth, under president Lyon Cohen, Congress set into motion an activist program that rings equally relevant today: to preserve Jewish identity and institutions; promote Jewish education and the survival of Yiddish; to fight intolerance; and to underscore the fraternity of all Jews in Canada.

During the 1920s the Canadian Jewish agenda included: bringing Jewish war orphans to Canada; enlisting international support for burgeoning Jewish populations in Western Canada; winning public educational rights in Quebec; and Jewish women establishing themselves as an activist force.

During the 1930s the same forces of hatred infecting Europe infiltrated Canada. Fascism and anti-Semitism reached their peak — even at the provincial and federal governmental levels — rendering the Canadian Jewish community virtually impotent when it tried to bring in refugees and to lobby governmental authorities.

CJC, however, resurrected itself nationally in 1934 to deal with the situation as best it could.

As the war began in 1939 with Samuel Bronfman at the helm of CJC, 16,000 Canadian Jews were in uniform. With news of the slaughter taking place in Europe and as Canada continued to bar Jewish refugees from its shores, CJC's Saul Hayes was already planning for the post-war years. Congress was supporting the effort to set the stage for Jewish statehood in Palestine.

In 1948 Canada finally opened its gates to the Jews, paving the way for a huge increase in Jewish population, the establishment of an even greater network of Jewish institutions, and an unprecedented vibrancy to Jewish life especially at the cultural level.

Meanwhile, Congress' Hayes and Bronfman, in partnership with the Jewish Agency and other bodies, were at the forefront in building coalitions to provide relief for the millions of Jewish victims of war and to protect Jewish interests in Palestine. In 1944, Hayes had been appointed Canadian Jewry's spokesman to the Montreal-based United Nations Relief Administration.

Congress and Zionist organizations all worked for the eventual creation of the State of Israel.

The 1950s were marked by the migration of thousands of Jews from Morocco and other French-speaking nations to Montreal.

From the 1960s to the present, the CJC agenda has in large measure been a reflection of the changing times. The generation of Canadian Jews with roots in Europe gave way to the modern, home-grown generation with a more sophisticated sense of itself.

The issues of this generation?

Soviet Jewry, Syrian Jewry, Cuban, Ethiopian Jewry. "Prisoners of conscience."

As survivors aged, Holocaust remembrance and documentation. As the forces of pluralism prevail: Christian-Jewish relations, Quebec nationalism, black-Jewish relations, inter-cultural committees, rapprochement, keeping younger Jews involved, the Constitution, a national unity committee.

To reach Jews across Canada, "a small communities" committee and strong regional programming. A continual process of Congress redefining and restructuring itself.

Also, fighting for war criminals legislation and hate propaganda laws, against the Heritage Front and Ku Klux Klan, the Keegstras and Zundels. Human rights.

Meetings with provincial and federal governmental officials on a regular basis.

Going full circle, Jewish education and continuity. Yiddish.

Abella would like to see the progress made during the first 75 years "grow exponentially" over the next, but with the issues of racism and anti-Semtisim behind the community.

"I see a strong Canada and a vital Jewish community," he said.

The Montreal reception, chaired by former CJC Quebec region chair Goldie Hershon, is the first of several events planned to coincide with the organization's 75th anniversary year:

- On March 19-20, CJC Ontario region will hold its plenary, which will recognize the anniversary. The Toronto anniversary chair is Carol Kassel.
- A special anniversary program will take place during the National Education Conference, April 17 in Winnipeg.
- The theme for the CJC Quebec region plenary April 24 is CJC Quebec region at 75: a New Agenda for a New Era.
- On May 29 in Ottawa, CJC will hold a conference on Non-Govermental Organizations (NGOs) in Canada: Partnerships in Human Rights. Justice Minister Allan Rock is the scheduled keynote speaker. Alti Rodal is chair of the Ottawa anniversary events.
- The following day in Ottawa, May 30, Canadian political leaders will be invited to attend a tribute to Canadian veterans on the eve of the 50th anniversary of D Day. CJC is organizing the event, to be presided over by Rabbi Reuven Bulka, in commemoration of its anniversary.
- Next fall, CJC Pacific Region will stage a "western conference" using the anniversary theme. The Atlantic Jewish Council will also meet during the same period and recognize CJC's 75th birthday.

Hershon said the approach the organization is taking for the anniversary is of a "festive celebration."

One of the major sponsors for the Montreal event is the Laurentian Bank, which, in its previous incarnation as The City and District Savings Bank, also sponsored the first CJC plenary assembly in 1919.

Plans were also being considered for a commemorative dinner, Hershon said, but they did not pan out because of budgetary constraints.

And as anyone who has attended a CJC executive meeting already knows, that is also a CJC tradition.

Luitjens to be released from Dutch prison in '95

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Nazi collaborator Jacob Luitjens, deported from Canada to his native Holland as a war criminal, will be released from jail in March 1995 after serving two years of a life sentence.

Coupled with the 18 months he was in custody between May 1945 and December 1946, when he escaped, he will have served less than four years for collaborating with the Nazis, an average term in the Dutch legal system, said reporter Harry Wubs.

Wubs, who has followed the case for the Groningen Northern Daily in Luitjens' old home town, said the former University of British Columbia botany instructor is being released due to his age (76) and because of his "good behavior" after the war.

The Dutch public does not believe the government is being too lenient with Luitjens, he said, although one resistance leader felt it was bad timing to release him only two months before the 50th anniversary celebrations of Holland's liberation.

Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, said, "In view of the fact that Luitjens' sentence was comparable to other sentences imposed by the Netherlands after the war. . . and in view of the fact that the Dutch government prosecuted thousands of war criminals after the war . . we're not inclinded to challenge the judgment of the Dutch government.

"To us, it's much more important that a person be tried and his crimes be exposed to friends and colleagues and he not be allowed to escape scot-free."

Canadian Jewish Congress president Irving Abella said, "We regret that the government of the Netherlands saw fit to commute his sentence. But we're happy he is not in Canada."

Abella said that while there is no indication that Luitjens will attempt to return to Canada, "we will do everything to ensure that the denaturalization process stands and that he will not be allowed back."

Luitjens was deported to the Netherlands after a hearing in Vancouver in which government prosecutors showed he must have lied about his wartime activities when he immigrated to Canada from Paraguay in 1961.

Evidence at his citizenship hearing showed he was a member of a Dutch Nazi group and that he participated in searching out Jews and resistance fighters. In one case, two guerillas were killed during a roundup in which he participated.

The Luitjens case marks the only time the Justice Department's war crime's unit has tried to strip an alleged war criminal of his citizenship and deport him; it is also the unit's only success in any legal actions against suspected war criminals.

Despite repeated requests by Jewish groups that denaturalization be employed against other suspects, the war crimes unit has not brought forward any new cases.

"I think the decision of the Dutch government is a two-edged sword," said Paul Marcus, director of B'nai Brith's institute for international affairs. "We have confidence in the Dutch justice system and the case shows that Nazi war criminals can be brought to justice.

"On the other hand, we're not in favor of leniency for war criminals and we're disappointed he will be released. Certainly victims of the Nazis were not given the same rights."

Police lay charges against O'Driscoll

TORONTO — University of Toronto professor Robert O'Driscoll, author and editor of a book that alleges an international conspiracy of Jews, masons and Communists to dominate the world, was charged recently with uttering death threats and making harassing telephone calls.

The complainant in the case is Elizabeth Elliot, who O'Driscoll describes in his controversial book, The New World Order and the Throne of the Anti-Christ, as his fiancee.

O'Driscoll was arrested on Feb. 24 by the Ontario Provincial Police detachment in Mount Forest, Ont., which is near his home in Arthur. O'Driscoll was released on bail. He is to appear in court again later this month.

Meanwhile, the University of Toronto is winding up an investigation into O'Driscoll's competence as a professor.

PM meets Lubavitch rabbis

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — Two Lubavitch rabbis presented Prime Minister Jean Chretien with a pair of silver candlesticks last week in honor of the approaching 92nd birthday of their spiritual leader, Rabbi Menachem Schneerson.

Rabbi Simcha Zirkind of Chabad Lubavitch in Montreal said he and his son, Rabbi Mendel Zirkind of Ottawa, explained to Chretien that the light from Sabbath candles signifies peace. They went on to say they hoped Chretien would be "blessed with an abundance of light, to bring peace, understanding, tolerance and intelligence to his family and to Canada."

"Of course," said Chretien after thanking the rabbis for their gift, "we need prayers and light in our lives, especially in these hard times, especially when you have the responsibility which Canadians have given to me."

Representatives of Chabad Lubavitch meet annually with the Prime Minister of Canada to honor Rabbi Schneerson's birthday which falls on the 11th of Nissan. They noted that this year, the date of their first meeting with Chretien also coincided with International Women's Day.

Some Lubavitch leaders are viewing the rebbe's illness, along with this month's shooting of a chassidic student on the Brooklyn Bridge, as a sign that redemption is near.

"This is the intensification of darkness which signals the coming light," explained Rabbi Shmuel Butman, who heads the Lubavitch Youth Organization and who has been outspoken in the effort to promote Rabbi Schneerson as the biblically prophesied Messiah.

Ninety-one-year-old Rabbi Schneerson, known simply as "the rebbe" to the hundreds of thousands of Lubavitch devotees worldwide, was first hospitalized last week after suffering a series of seizures related to a previous stroke, which left his right side paralyzed.

At a news conference at Beth Israel Medical Centre in Manhattan where Rabbi Schneerson is being treated, Dr. Matthew Fink, the director of neurology, said the most recent stroke "seriously weakened" the rebbe's left side.

It was too early to gauge the extent of the damage or whether treatment will be effective, Fink said.

Rabbi Schneerson — who has led the movement since 1950 — had been bedridden at Lubavitch headquarters in Crown Heights since a stroke two years ago left him almost completely debilitated.

Despite the rebbe's frail health, virtually no one in the Lubavitch movement is willing to publicly speculate on the future.

"The fervent hope and prayer is that he will get better," said Rabbi Joseph Spielman, chairman of the Crown Heights Community Council. "There is no other agenda."

Under Rabbi Schneerson's guidance, the movement has reached out to unaffiliated and disenfranchised Jews with an appeal of firm laws and religious certainties.

There are an estimated 1,500 Lubavitch centres worldwide performing outreach and religious services.

Much of the lure has been the intensity surrounding Rabbi Schneerson himself, who offered personal directives on everything from marriage partners to Hurricane Andrew and the 1991 Persian Gulf War.

The situation is exacerbated by the fact that Rabbi Schneerson, the seventh leader of the spiritual sect founded in 18th century Russia, has no heir.

Nevertheless, the movement's leaders remain focused on the rebbe's recovery.

Rabbi Butman points out that, according to the Hebrew calendar, the most recent stroke occurred exactly two years to the day after the rebbe's first stroke, in 1992.

"You can clearly see this is G-d's hand," he said.

A duty officer at the 71th Precinct in Crown Heights said police officials are monitoring the rebbe's condition, which they describe as the most serious ever, and have put officers throughout New York on standby in the event that "Operation Demise," a massive contingency plan to cordon off the streets of Crown Heights and import thousands of police officers, has to be implemented.

Police are expecting millions of visitors to Crown Heights over a 10-day period in the event of the rebbe's death.

Rebbe's condition stable

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — As of Monday, Lubavitcher Rebbe Menachem Schneerson remained in stable but serious condition in a Manhattan intensive care unit, following a stroke two weeks ago.

French elections set for Pesach

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — France's chief rabbi and the country's interior minister are at loggerheads over the timing of municipal elections, which fall on the first day of Passover. After Interior Minister Charles Pasqua refused to accommodate religious Jews, Chief Rabbi Joseph Sitruk issued a call in the Jewish weekly Tribune Juive that French Jews should not vote in the March 27 elections.

"We had sought a special arrangement," Rabbi Sitruk announced in the newspaper. "But if the date cannot be changed, then it is regrettably my duty to call on Jews not to vote on this particularly important day of the Jewish calendar."

Rabbi Sitruk had previously asked Pasqua if observant Jews could vote by mail or be exempt from signing the attendance sheet at the polling station.

But Pasqua, a staunch secularist, said this was not possible.

"There is no state religion in France, where freedom of worship is absolute, but we cannot make exceptions," Pasqua stated.

A similar situation recently surfaced in Italy, where general elections had been scheduled for the same day. The Italian government later decided to extend voting by a day.

The French interior minister has recently been attempting to limit the influence of fundamentalism among the country's Muslim community, and apparently he wished to keep his secularist stance consistent when it came to the country's Jewish constituency.

CRIF, the umbrella body representing French Jewry, refused to comment about Rabbi Sitruk's call on observant Jews not to vote. But sources close to CRIF made it clear that the declaration of the chief rabbi was an embarrassment.

Rabbi Sitruk's aides told the Jewish Telegraphic Agency that the chief rabbi had been misunderstood.

Rabbi Sitruk's statement also prompted an angry answer in the influential newspaper Le Monde.

"In spite of the chief rabbi, I'll vote on March 27," wrote Guy Konopnicki, a Jewish writer and a former communist leader.

"This day, as a Jew, I'll observe the feast of Pesach. According to the tradition, I'll tell my children about slavery in Egypt. 'We were slaves in the land of Egypt,' says the Haggadah," he wrote.

"This is what I will add," Konopnicki said. "We were slaves, and in the republic of France we are citizens and free men, which should incite the chief rabbi to be more prudent when he calls upon us not to accomplish our civic duty."

Harvey Peranson inquires about the origin of his name.

The source is "Ber" (Yiddish for bear), which symbolized the tribe of Issachar.

There are many surnames generated by this source. To name a few that are familiar:

Bernson, Bernstein, Berman, Berko, Berkovitch, Berelson, Berlin.

SCHNEIDER — SHUSTER

Occupational surnames are prolific amongst Jews. Horatio Alger used them as in "Phil the Fiddler."

It is interesting to note that this is likewise a feature of English surnames.

Settlers expected to stay put for now

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — Israeli Environment Minister Yossi Sarid said he believes that negotiations with the PLO will resume by the end of this week. Sarid said the government would reject the PLO demand that Jewish settlers be removed from Hebron before talks are renewed. He did not, however, rule out taking such a step for security reasons.

"I strongly recommend to the PLO that they not present any pre-conditions for continuing negotiations," he said in response to a question about the possible removal of the settlers. "If the government of Israel comes to the conclusion that, for security reasons, it must take such measures, it will do so — without any connection to the demands of the PLO or anyone else," said Sarid.

Since the Hebron massacre, several ministers have come out in favor of evacuating the settlers from Hebron. They have pointed out that 1,000 soldiers are required to protect 60 Jewish families living there. But some ministers who have long favored the removal of the settlers are concerned that such a move could be seen as giving into PLO pressure.

"I have always been opposed to the settlement of Jews in the heart of Hebron," said Agriculture Minister Yaacov Tsur last week. "But to remove them now would be a great mistake. It would be construed as giving into Palestinian demands and could open the way for a long list of other conditions."

Sarid's comments suggest that the government may decide to evacuate the Hebron settlers, but will not do so at a time in which such a move could be seen as surrendering to PLO demands.

The environment minister — who is closely involved in the negotiations — also said he did not wish to see greater American involvement in the talks. "In the aftermath of the Hebron massacre, there was a need for U.S. involvement in order to get the negotiations back on track. But I hope that with the renewal of talks, American involvement won't be necessary to the same degree."

Sarid also warned that Russian involvement in the negotiations would be detrimental unless it is closely co-ordinated with the United States. "This region was for many years the victim of tensions and confrontations between the two super powers. We would not like to see a return to that situation."

Sarid's prediction that talks will resume by the end of the week came following a meeting in Tunis between PLO chairman Yasser Arafat and an Israeli Foreign Ministry team led by Director General Uri Savir.

During the meeting Savir reportedly informed Arafat that the Palestinians could raise any subject during the talks as long as both sides adhered to the Oslo agreement.

Jewish groups outlawed

The cabinet's decision was based on evidence, submitted by Israeli security services and police, that implicates the two groups in a series of unsolved murders of Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

The government ban extends to all groups associated with the two organizations and to any that may spring up in response to the ban, should new groups share the same violent anti-Arab philosophies.

Justice Minister David Libai said the government had taken the measures only after there had been very serious consideration of the implications of the action on Israeli democracy.

While the opposition parties' reaction to the ban was generally muted, Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu thought a six-month ban should have been imposed initially.

National Religious Party leader Zevulun Hammer and Tsomet's Rafael Eitan both said the government should have taken action against individuals rather than organizations.

Former Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir supported the ban, saying, "We have no need for such organizations. Nothing good can come from them."

* * *

In an interview with The CJN's Ron Csillag prior to the ban, Mike Guzofsky, leader of Kahane Chai's North American operations, said his group still enjoys "strong" support in Israel.

The New York-based Guzofsky, 29, said a "Jewish intifada" has started in the territories by settlers who feel Rabin has abandoned them.

As the situation becomes more violent, he believes most Jewish residents will leave Judea, Samaria and Gaza, but that between one-quarter and one-third "hard-core" settlers will stay. He said those remaining would be willing to use arms against Israeli soldiers attempting to throw them out.

"There will be an explosion," he warned. "This is a war of survival for the Jewish people."

Guzofsky and Kahane Chai don't support Baruch Goldstein's action, "but we can't condemn it either.

"No one in Kahane Chai wants to see Arabs die. We certainly don't want to see Jews die, but we also don't want to see Arabs die. A person like Goldstein took the desperate act he took after he and his family had been abandoned, and he honestly believed that just a few months down the line, he and and his family and many Jews would be massacred at the hands of Yasser Arafat's henchmen.

"It's that desperate situation that brought a peace-loving, soft-spoken, sweet person to take the action he took. And within the context of that insane situation, we showed understanding for what he did.

"But we don't believe that's the solution and it's certainly not our philosophy to kill Arabs."

Syrian Jews 'panic-stricken' over threat of pogrom

Those in possession of exit permits are hampered because only two international flights leave the country each week.

Meanwhile, Syria continues its policy of splitting families.

She pointed to one family of 16 that will not leave the country until exit documents are provided a single remaining member.

Carr said that up until the threat of the pogrom, about 300 to 400 Jews (out of a pre-threat population of 1,100) would have remained in Syria voluntarily. She expects that now, only 100 to 120 will stay, some of them elderly, who do not wish to start a new life elsewhere.

Spector praises Canada-Israel ties

Ambassador addresses UIA mission

JERUSALEM — "Canada-Israel relations have come a long way since the late 1980s," Canadian Ambassador to Israel, Norman Spector, told a United Israel Appeal (UIA) of Canada mission in Tel Aviv recently.

The mission, chaired by Dr. Gerald Halbert, UIA president, consisted of campaign chairpersons who represented communities across Canada.

Spector said that Canada's boycott on the importing of Israeli defence products to Canada may be lifted soon, in light of progress made in the Middle East peace process. He expects positive changes as well, in the foreign-trade agreement between Canada and Israel.

"I feel our relations have gone beyond good words and platitudes," he stated. "Last year we approved a research-and-development fund, and it will start in the next couple of months. Last November, Prime Minister [Yitzhak] Rabin had excellent meetings in Canada with Prime Minister [Jean] Chretien and the Foreign Minister.

"We are playing a fairly active role in the peace process, more than I had expected," Spector added. "All sides recognize this. We chair a working group on refugees."

Spector recalled that, after a visit to Canada Centre, the recreation complex in Metulla, the U.S. ambassador wanted to compliment him on this wonderful Canadian initiative. "I had to confess to him that it was not the Canadian government but the UIA which made this project possible," he told the mission."

Following his comments, the group heard a report from two of its own members, Harvey Levenson and Dale Boidman of Montreal. Levenson is general campaign chair of CJA, and Boidman chairs the women's division. They were part of a small group that had visited remote communities in some of the Republics of the former Soviet Union.

They reported that people live in poverty and incredibly primitive surroundings with no personal safety, although large and vibrant Jewish communities remain in some places. Levenson and Boidman praised the work of the Jewish Agency emissaries in these communities.

Using slides and videos to illustrate their report, they pointed to the emissaries' tireless work in ulpan classes, in Aliyah preparation and generally in providing the Jews with a feeling that someone is looking after them, providing safety and direction.

Levenson said that desperate economic conditions are such that the Jews "are sitting on a time bomb; the Jewish Agency feels that we have a window of another couple of years — no more. They must be gotten out of there as quickly as possible."

The gunslinger vs. the mediator: and the winner is . . .

In my last column I examined two extremes in legal counsel: the "gunslinger" and "the mediator". Clients of the former often call their lawyers over every little dispute that arises and insist on courtroom action.

The other extreme can be just as bad. Some clients are too scared of spending money and much too afraid of their spouse. They prevent their lawyer from taking critical strategic steps at the beginning of a case to place them in a safer environment that will leave them with a stronger negotiating strategy. Such clients dream of a quick, cheap and friendly settlement.

Many cases warrant such an approach. But when my client's safety, children, property or sustenance is in jeopardy, I must advise that we obtain whatever necessary court orders are available to protect that client. Unfortunately, in some cases, particularly where property may quickly disappear, or where a spouse or child has been abused, I must beg such clients to permit me to proceed forcefully and, after an initial access, negotiate from a position of strength. Notwithstanding my advice to the contrary, such clients would rather risk their safety or property than further anger the other spouse.

The key to success is to strike a balance between forceful action where necessary and informed settlement discussions when courtroom action is unwarranted. Accordingly, if you or a friend is searching for a lawyer, look for chochem: wisdom. Wisdom in this business is a function of practical experience in similar cases, knowledge of the law, knowledge of the lawyer who represents the opposition, and an eye wide open to your budget for legal services. (I am always reminded of a famous New York Times cartoon in which a rotund lawyer, smoking a fat cigar, glowers over his large desk at his much smaller client and bellows, "Well, Mr. Jones, just how much justice can you afford?")

Choose the wise lawyer and leave the stereotypes for television. When making your inquiries, don't just ask if the proposed lawyer is TOUGH. Ask if he/she solves problems, expedites issues, returns phone calls, bills fairly, is friendly, is respected by other lawyers, is prepared for meetings and court hearings or discoveries. Does he/she engage in senseless correspondence to please the client rather than solve the problem through real dialogue or court procedures? Are letters that really are important actually written?

Once you make the choice, make sure that the lawyer listens to you. But be just as careful about listening to him or her.

I guess it's like getting married again. Think of it! If you make the wrong choice, then you'll have to hire a new divorce lawyer to get a "divorce" from your present lawyer. Maybe Freud was right and we should have all stayed in the womb.

There is a misconception that so-called brokers can purchase or lease cars for less than an authorized dealer. Nothing can be further from the truth. And, there is far less hassle involved in establishing warranty registration, service, dependability, etc.

The News in Brief

CJC Blasts PAD on Immigrants

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress has joined Chinese Family Services of Greater Montreal and the Black Coalition of Quebec in voicing concern at resolutions on immigration adopted by the new Parti Action Democratique (PAD) at its opening convention this month. The Quebec sovereigntist party's platform calls on immigrants to sign a "social contract" that includes a five-year surveillance period wherein immigrants who fail to comply with francization would be asked to reimburse the province for the cost of their integration. CJC Quebec region chair Manuel Schacter called the proposals "very disturbing."

Church Backs Ross Appeal

FREDERICTON — The Woolastock presbytery of the United Church of Canada has issued a news release supporting the decision of the New Brunswick justice ministry to appeal the Malcolm Ross case to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Rev. Jim Leland said the presbytery (a division of the church) took the unusual step of commenting on a legal case because "a lot of our people were concerned with the [Appeal Court] ruling. Many called me and said, 'Let's do something, write to the premier and make our feelings known.' "

In a judgment last December, the New Brunswick Court of Appeal overturned a lower court decision that had upheld Ross' removal from a Moncton-area classroom.

Rev. Leland said his parishioners wnated to provide "moral and spiritual support to the New Brunswick government" for taking the case to the Supreme Court.

Compensation for Hebron Victims

JERUSALEM — Compensating victims of the Hebron massacre will cost Israel $6.67 million (U.S.), Labor and Social Affairs Minister Ora Namir said last week.

Civil administration spokeswoman Elise Shazar said the list of the wounded is still being compiled. Work is proceeding slowly, she said, because of the curfew imposed on the city and because of the holy month of Ramadan, which ends this week.

Sources said that apart from the 29 killed in the mosque shooting, and five killed in the aftermath, the number of wounded — some lightly and some seriously — is about 120.

While the government is picking up the bill for medical services for the wounded and has fixed a $1,666 grant for bereaved families, the range of compensation has not been officially published. Compensation will be paid by the National Insurance Institute, but the claims will be handled through the civil administration.

Housing Ministry Ready to Help

JERUSALEM — Israel's Housing Ministry is ready to provide assistance for all families wishing to leave the territories for security reasons, even though there has been no change in official government policy, Housing Minister Binyamin Ben-Eliezer told the Knesset last Wednesday.

Ben-Eliezer stressed that he is helping each family for humanitarian reasons, "so that the children will not be forced to live on the streets."

But he also said the government would have to provide assistance in an orderly manner and not in an ad hoc way, as has been the case so far.

Thirty-four families have applied to the Housing Ministry for aid to enable them to find housing inside the Green Line since the Hebron massacre, said Ben-Eliezer. Each family has received a one-year subsidy of 810 shekels a month.

Ben-Eliezer said there is no provision in his budget for this expenditure, and therefore the matter had to be settled with the Treasury.

Israeli Arabs Travel to Syria

JERUSALEM — A group of 50 Israeli Arabs embarked on an unprecedented trip to Syria earlier this month to pay condolences to Syrian President Hafez Assad.

Assad's son, Bassel, was killed in a car accident in January.

The delegation included Knesset Member Abdul Wahab Darawshe, head of the Arab Democratic Party.

The trip is reported to be the first time Assad has given permission for a group of Israeli citizens to visit Syria.

The trip was complicated, however, by Syrian demands that the delegation not cross into Syria from the Golan Heights and that they not use Israeli passports.

Jews Most Frequent Targets

WASHINGTON — Jews were the most frequent targets of hate crimes based on religion in 1992, according to an FBI report released last week.

Crimes against Jews constituted an overwhelming 87 percent of all reported crimes motivated by bias against religious groups in 1992. This figure was similar to the 1991 figure of 86 percent.

Skewing the numbers, however, was the fact that less than half of American law enforcement agencies provided information for the FBI's report.

Crimes motivated by bias against religion constituted 15.4 percent of all hate crimes reported.

Anti-Jewish crimes made up 13.4 percent of all hate crimes from any category. In 1991, when far fewer enforcement agencies reported their hate crime statistics to the FBI, anti-Jewish crimes were 16.7 percent of the total.

UN Condemns Anti-Semitism

GENEVA — Following a year-long campaign by the World Jewish Congress, the United Nations for the first time in its history formally condemned anti-Semitism in a resolution adopted last week by its Commission on Human Rights here. The 53-member Human Rights Commission included the condemnation of anti-Semitism in a general resolution on all forms of racism, which culminated weeks of behind-the-scenes wrangling with Western countries lined up against a rejectionist group led by Syria. The resolution, sponsored by Turkey, condemns not only anti-Semitism but also discrimination against Muslims, Arabs and what it calls "Negrophobia."

French Ready for Jewish President...

PARIS — Only 13 per cent of the French people would object to having a Jew as their president, according to a survey published recently by the Roman Catholic weekly La Vie.

More than 80 per cent of those polled said they would not mind voting for a Jew; six per cent refused to answer.

The poll also inquired about the Dreyfus Affair, the nearly 100-year-old case in which French officer Alfred Dreyfus was sentenced to life imprisonment for spying for the Germans. The sentence, motivated by widespread anti-Semitism within the French army, was later commuted.

A majority of those polled — 51 per cent — said the case is neither taught sufficiently at school nor, according to 46 per cent of respondents, discussed sufficiently by the media.

Asked whether racism, xenophobia and anti-Semitism had increased within French society since the Dreyfus case, 45 per cent said yes, while 13 per cent thought the problems had decreased.

...But Fewer Germans Are

BERLIN — More than one in five German adults have hostile attitudes toward Jews, according to the results of a survey released this month.

Conducted for the American Jewish Committee, the survey shows a growing number of Germans — 26 per cent of respondents, compared to 14 per cent four years ago — feel anti-Semitism is a very serious problem in their country.

In the current poll, 31 per cent said Jews exert too much influence on world events, compared to 38 per cent in 1990. As well, 39 per cent of those interviewed thought Jews are exploiting the Holocaust for their own purposes — the highest percentage of any of the questions in the survey.

Asked if they would approve of a party nominating a Jew as its candidate for president of Germany, 28 per cent said no. All told, between 20 and 39 per cent of respondents expressed negative attitudes towards Jews.

Righteous Gentile Dies

ROME — Guelfo Zamboni, an Italian diplomat who saved nearly 300 Jews during World War II by giving them false papers, died in Rome last weekend at the age of 97.

In 1943 Zamboni was Italian consul in Salonika, Greece, when the city's 55,000 Jews came under the harsh persecution of the Nazi occupiers, who began deportations to Auschwitz in March of that year.

He was able to get documents enabling 280 Jews to flee to Athens, which was under Italian military occupation, thus saving them from deportation.

In October 1992, Israeli Ambassador to Italy Avi Pazner conferred on Zamboni the medal of honor from Yad Vashem, and 280 trees were planted in Jerusalem — one for each of the Jews he saved.

Hebron attack the result of an atmosphere of fear

By YECHIEL M. LEITER

Like all responsible communities in Israel, the Jews living in Judea, Samaria and Gaza, and the Yesha Council which represents them, have expressed their unequivocal condemnation of the attack in Hebron and extended their condolences to the families of the victims.

This is the only possible response from a community of people who have always fostered and worked for peaceful co-existence between Jews and Arabs, even under the most difficult circumstances. Despite six and a half years of incessant attacks on our innocents, despite attempts by the Rabin government to make our lives difficult and force us out, we have always insisted that there will never be true peace unless Jews have full rights to live in all parts of our homeland.

The human tragedy that took place at the Machpelah Cave was not born in a vacuum and was by no means a first. We in the settlements have warned for years about the dangers of Balkanization in central Israel. Since the signing of the Israel-PLO Declaration of Principles, those dangers have become all too real. Thirty Jews have been slaughtered by terrorists over the last five and a half months, and just in the past few weeks 19 Arabs were murdered by fellow Arabs.

The Hebron attack was the act of a single man, not an organized plot or an orchestrated campaign of violence. As such, its consequences should be removed from political machinations and diplomatic processes. A shocking aberration from any norms accepted in Israeli society, the act of a lone gunman should not be used as an excuse for far-reaching Israeli concessions on the political plane.

How very different are the acts of violence perpetrated by Arab terrorists on a daily basis. Terrorism, violence, even mass murder by Arab gangs serve as part and parcel of their diplomacy. Terror is consistently used as a means to extract ever-further concessions from Israel. Far from reacting with shock or condemning the murderers of Jews, mainstream Arab leaders accept, condone and often encourage them.

The attempts to posit a moral equivalence between Friday's attack and Arab terrorism is no less reprehensible. Surely, Palestinian Arab leaders are the last who can speak out with indignation. The groups representing the Palestinian Arabs range from Hamas and Islamic Jihad to the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine and Fatah, all terrorist organizations which have made an art out of the acts they now condemn.

PLO leader, Yasser Arafat, and his deputies in Tunis, appearing on international television as "experts" on the Hebron attack, were unashamed to assert a host of blatant falsehoods in their bid for increased world pressure on Israel: that Dr. Baruch Goldstein had at least 10 accomplices, that the Israeli government and the IDF were conspirators in his attack, that the shootings lasted close to half an hour. And the Israeli government, always eager to keep Arafat happy, ignored its negotiating partners' flagrant lies.

This is the reverse of the stance the government should be taking. The attack represents an unfortunate consequence of the atmosphere of fear pervading Judea, Samaria and Gaza. Only firm steps taken to stop the escalating violence against Jews there can ensure that similar atrocities do not occur again.

It has been suggested that it is time for the settlement community to engage in collective soul-searching. While soul-searching is always a good idea, the glee of the left in calling for it only now is transparent and self-serving. Soul-searching is no less the responsibility of those whose moral outrage is largely muted when Jews are slaughtered. Not only do they refrain from condemning the perpetrators of the attacks, but they lend them legitimacy by negotiating with them.

Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and his government have clearly lost control of the situation. It was inevitable that it would happen and tragedy ensue, since the path the government has been following is one which requires the support and encouragement of the overwhelming majority of the population. The government's minority status is not sufficient backing for it to force the Declaration of Principles with the PLO murder group down the throats of the Israeli public.

If the Land of Israel is to be divided, then it must be done by a united people. Otherwise, dividing the land will result in dividing the people irreparably.

(Yechiel M. Leiter is the executive director of the foreign desk of the Yesha Council, which represents the Jewish communities in Judea, Samaria and Gaza.)

Israel's health care system faces many problems

By CARL ALPERT

The United States is not the only country which has been facing up to the problems of national health care. Israel, too, has been confronted with similar problems, which in recent months have erupted into a crisis.

A look at the background is necessary for an understanding of the present controversy. For decades the all-powerful Histadrut, Israel's labor federation, offered its members health insurance through the Kupat Holim, literally, Fund for the Sick. The hospitals, clinics and medical services of the Fund blanketed the country, serving also as a most powerful inducement for membership in the Histadrut.

Changes came with the years. The charge was made that the union was siphoning off a greater percentage of the dues to maintain a bloated union bureaucracy, and as a result less and less, relatively, was going into the health services. Kupat Holim accumulated large deficits. Increasing numbers of the membership became unhappy with the service they were getting and sought alternative, better services. This they found in the several private health funds which were set up. Competition became acute.

During the Likud government, the then health minister, Ehud Olmert, drew up a bill which called for comprehensive national health service. Payments would be collected from every resident by the Bituah Leumi, the national insurance institute, and every citizen would be covered, whether a union member or not. The premium would be set in accordance with the economic status of each individual.

The Histadrut interpreted this as an attempt to undermine it. The Labor Party rallied its opposition, and Olmert's bill never got off the ground.

The idea was not lost, however, and when the Labor Government came into power its Minister of Health, Haim Ramon, proposed legislation, not unlike the Olmert plan, calling for the establishment of state sponsored national health insurance for all. The Likud was delighted, and pledged its support. Backers of the Histadrut in the Labor Party rose up in fury, intent on preserving the union's hegemony in such matters. Opinion in the party split. More than one economist predicted that if the new law was passed, tens of thousands of people would terminate their membership in the Histadrut.

Ignoring the union opposition, Ramon managed to get his bill on the agenda of the Knesset. Under his plan, the several health services, including Kupat Holim, would continue to operate, and citizens could choose whichever they wished — whichever gave the better service. The progressive fees, however, would be collected through the government Bituah Leumi. It was estimated that more than 60 per cent of the population would pay less than they do today. The government, in turn, would reimburse the respective health services on the basis of services rendered.

Charging that this was nothing less than an attempt to destroy the labor federation, the Histadrut steam-rollered through the Labor Party convention a series of changes in the proposed bill, designed to preserve the unbreakable link between membership in the federation and insurance rights in Kupat Holim. The government cabinet, controlled by the Labor Party, then instructed that the bill drawn up by Ramon should be removed from the Knesset agenda, ostensibly to be rewritten. Ramon resigned as minister of health.

Most observers predict that the plan for a comprehensive national health insurance is dead and will not be revived, at least so long as Labor is in power.

Basically, there are two principal issues in this controversy. One is the nature of the health insurance program. The other revolves around the nature and functions of the Histadrut. Critics point out that it is a hydra-headed organization. It is a labor union; it is the owner and operator of large industrial and financial concerns; it runs a network of schools; it sponsors numerous cultural and educational facilities; it runs a health insurance and health service program. Many voices these days advocate that it divest itself of all these manifold activities and confine itself to the functions of a trade union, looking after the interests of the working class.

Search for academic truth hits Jewish studies

By ARNOLD AGES

Forty years ago when I began my university education at Carleton College in Ottawa, there was no such thing as Jewish studies. Occasionally, a student could find a course called Religious Knowledge where some insights into Judaism and the Bible could be obtained. In fact, Carleton was unique in the 1950s because it engaged Rabbi Simon Eckstein of Ottawa to teach a course on the Bible from a Jewish perpective. I was privileged to enroll in his class.

Four decades later the situation has changed radically. More than 400 institutions of higher learning in North America and Europe now offer Jewish studies at the undergraduate and graduate level. The major Ivy League schools, most of the state universities in the United States, and Canadian institutions such as York, the University of Toronto, McGill, University of British Columbia, University of Manitoba and Concordia have programs with specialists in Bible, Talmud, Jewish philosophy and history.

It is at the university level that many Jewish students have an opportunity, for the first time since their elementary Jewish education, to see the richness and diversity of Jewish civilization as manifested in the Bible, Talmud, codes and rich exegetical literature. The availability of these courses shows students that Judaism and its texts have as much right to be represented in the university curriculum as other disciplines.

However, like other disciplines, Jewish studies have not been unaffected by the worldwide recession. Many departments have had to cut back on their programs but by dint of various economies, the majority of them are maintaining their critical velocities. The number of scholarly books on Jewish themes published by Princeton, Havard, New York University, the University of California and Indiana University Press continues to grow each year, enriching our knowledge of the Jewish past and present.

Arnold Ages

With such a splendid profile, one would think that Jewish studies at the university level is sailing along without a ripple, but the fact is that there are waves and swells.

One of the problems is common to all religious traditions exposed to the university curriculum. The starting point for an academic inquiry into any discipline is the search for truth no matter where that search leads. This approach abuts directly against religious convictions in which truth is not seen as a process but rather as an article of faith which is not amenable to rational analysis.

But are the approaches of religion and scholarship necessarily at odds with each other? Prof. David Noel Freedman, one of the outstanding Bible scholars of our day, argues in a recent two-part interview in The Bible Review, that there are areas of mutual interest to the religious researcher and the academic one, which need not occasion friction or disagreement.

Freedman, author of a recent book entitled The Unity of the Hebrew Bible also indicates that, as general editor of The Anchor Bible Dictionary, an ambitious work of scholarship, he has been working happily with a broad range of Bible scholars from different university disciplines and with scholars from Christian seminaries and rabbinical schools. Freedman's argument is simple: people with deep religious commitments can work in the vineyards of Bible study along with secularists and humanists without surrendering any doctrinal purity.

Perhaps.

That is not the view of a recent writer in The Jewish Press (Jan. 28). In an article entitled Jewish Studies on campus, he argues that university courses on Bible and Talmud may be deleterious to the spiritual health of Jewish students. In buttressing his argument the writer alludes to a passage in tractate Yoma (72b) where it is stated that the Torah, properly used, is like medicine — but when misused, is comparable to a deadly poison.

In his polemic against Jewish studies, the writer identifies as a source of contamination higher biblical criticism, which applies conventional literary criticism to the oral and the written Law. Both of these, in the traditional perspective, are seen as divinely mandated. Students from religious backgrounds, he argues, might conclude that the Judaism they have studied is a fraud.

There is some merit to this argument: university education is not for everyone and not only for the reason the writer cites. But he draws a conclusion that does not necessarily follow from its premise. His argument also hinges on an excessively pessimistic view of students from religious backgrounds, who are thought to be incapable of grappling with diverse ways of looking at texts. The writer gives religious students insufficient credit for the learning and intellectual sophistication they have acquired in their home environment. Some would argue, moreover, that faith and religious commitment can be immeasurably strengthened by confrontation with other views.

In my view, inclusion of Jewish studies is one of the most exciting developments in the university curriculum in the last half century.

Encore, Damascus

The currents of Jewish history sometimes pull us back even as we move forward.

In 1840, at this time of year just before Pesach, the Jewish community of Damascus faced a terrible threat. Falsely accused of the age-old perfidious blood libel, several members of the community were arrested, tortured and murdered; 63 Jewish children were seized by the authorities as a means of obtaining "evidence" in a sham investigation. The entire community stared directly into the grisly face of impending pogrom.

Ultimately however, due to the timely intervention of outraged Jews and non-Jews from the West, the pogrom was averted. The ruler of Syria was forced to issue an order protecting the community from the violence of the mob. And some months later, he set free the few Jewish prisoners who were still alive. The frightening incident became known in our history as the Damascus affair.

In a haunting echo of bygone fears, the Syrian Muslim Party of Justice last week threatened that "the blood of all Jews living in Syria would be spilled" starting March 13, the end of Ramadan. But again, with Pesach in sight, the Jewish community of Damascus, thus far at least, has been spared pogrom.

Again, Jews and non-Jews alike from the West quickly mobilized to pressure the Assad regime to protect the few remaining Jews left in Syria and to facilitate their safe, speedy departure from the country which has been their home for centuries.

The second Damascus "affair" reminds us that in various pockets of the world, Jews still remain in jeopardy.

Many Jews are still trapped in Bosnia.

In Iran, the entire country is a form of prison and the Jewish community, along with other non-Muslim groups, its prisoners.

In Russia, ugly, inhospitable nationalism has again raised its Jew-hating head. Thousands of Jews anxiously "sit on their suitcases" awaiting the next manifestation of the familiar but bullying xenophobia that generates stomach-wrenching fear.

As long as Jews are in jeopardy, we have our responsibility to them. The weight of that responsibility is borne across generations through time uncounted. It is carried in our hearts by collective memory. And it must always stir us to act.

It is worthy to note that as we prayed last Shabbat in the synagogue, we also ushered in the new month of Nisan, the month of Pesach, in words whose simple plea was dedicated to all Jews beseeching their safe and speedy ingathering wherever they are in distress throughout the world.

Such are the currents of Jewish history.

Russian wake-up call

Within the last six months Russian Jews have received a dramatic wake-up call regarding their security and future in the former Soviet Union.

In 1993, Russian Jews were talking about a reconstituted Jewish community on Russian soil. A thriving Jewish life seemed to be taking root; a network of Jewish schools, newspapers and youth organizations all pointed to a mini-renascence of the community.

That scenario has changed radically since the sprint to prominence in December 1993 of Vladimir Zhirinovsky and his liberal Democratic Party. Together they received more than 24 per cent of the popular vote — a staggering endorsement of a party and a man who represent the crude extremes of Russian racism and xenophobia.

The Chief Rabbi of Moscow, Pinchas Goldschmidt, put it well when he said: "I am sure 25 per cent of Russians who voted for Zhirinovsky believe in what he says, even if he does not."

Chilling words. They are also realistic ones, for they express the vise-like atmosphere which Russian Jews are beginning to feel as they experience the pressure of Zhirinovsky's anti-Semitic tirades on the one hand and the seeming impotence of Boris Yeltsin on the other. Also contributing to the malaise of Russian Jews is the sharp downturn in Russia's economic performance.

In the past, these factors (along with extremist nationalist sentiments) have formed the matrix for explosions of anti-Semitism. A future election in which members of Zhirinovsky's coalition take power would make a dreary prognosis even more certain.

It is for these reasons that even Russian Jews who have argued on behalf of a continued Jewish presence in Russia — Tankred G. Golanpolsky to cite one example (the editor who successfully won a court case against the printers of the Protocols of the Elders of Zion) — are now recommending that people prepare for emigration.

As the democracies systematically seal off their borders to immigrants seeking respite from regimes which persecute their religious and racial minorities, Israel continues to remain a beacon of light. Many Russian Jews who have read the handwriting on the wall inscribed by Vladimir Zhirinovsky and his ilk will no doubt be availing themselves quickly of the opportunity to go to Israel.

The sooner the better.

Letters to the Editor

Letters are welcome if they are brief, in English or French, typewritten with lines double spaced, and of interest to our reading public. Readers are cautioned not to make sweeping claims against persons or institutions which they cannot verify, as libel laws are very stringent. WOMEN FOR PEACE

We, members of Palestinian and Jewish Women for Peace, wish to express our shock and horror over the recent events in Hebron. We grieve beside the survivors and families of the victims.

We believe that the massacre of innocent civilians was part of a calculated attempt to hinder the ongoing peace process. We urge those involved in the peace process not to allow the actions of one or a few to destroy the work of many. These events must not thwart the recent progress which has been made. We are frightened by the influence of groups such as Kach and deplore Israel's laxity in curbing their illegal activies.

Palestinian and Jewish Women for Peace is a group of Vancouver Palestinian and Jewish women meeting to build understanding and trust through dialogue. Over the past two years, our group has made great progress. Although recent events are discouraging, now more than ever, we persist in our commitment to promoting a just, lasting and comprehensive peace.

THE KRENTZMAN AFFAIR

After having read the article by Janice Arnold (March 3) on the Jewish community's reaction to Rabbi Krentzman's conviction, I felt compelled to write this letter.

I was always taught that as Jews we must practise forgiveness, that none of us is perfect and that we all pray to G-d to forgive our wrong doings and that He alone has the power to do so. Why then do I read in your newspaper comments attributed to our community leaders, attempting to distance themselves from Rabbi Krentzman? Why do I read about comments attributed to a well known community rabbi suggesting that this incident may lead to heightened scrutiny about who is entrusted with community responsibility?

I would expect to read remarks suggesting that Rabbi Krentzman, for whatever reason, took a wrong path, that we must forgive him for his wrong doings and that we should help him return to the right road. I would also have expected our community leaders to have reminded us of all the good things that Rabbi Krentzman did for his community.

I for one had the opportunity to work with Rabbi Krentzman when he was executive director of The Jewish Education Council. While we did not always see eye to eye on issues, he always was willing to listen and I can assure you he put in tireless efforts on behalf of our children. I can also remember, long after we stopped working together, Rabbi Krentzman coming to my house when I was sitting shiva for my late mother. He came to comfort me, and to explain the Jewish way of dealing with death.

It certainly appears to me that many people in this community have forgotten our Jewish ways and are concerned only about how this incident might reflect on the Jewish community and therefore by extension on themselves. In reality our only concern should be, how do we ensure that one of our own returns to the fold.

SHULS AND JOBS

At a time when unemployment is at record high levels, I would suggest that synagogues, which have not already done so, form in-house committees to help job-seekers find employment. In assisting the unemployed, synagogues will be doing a mitzvah.

The announcement of the formation of such committees, along with their phone and fax numbers, should be published by The Canadian Jewish News as a public service.

THE CONTRAST

A Muslim group planted a bomb in the altar of a Christian church in Lebanon, killing 10 Christians and guess what happened.

Nothing.

No calls for United Nations action. No Security Council meeting. No newspaper headlines.

No flaming editorials. No ringing denunciation by our foreign minister. No calls for international bombing. No calls to disarm the Muslims. No mass demonstrations.

Nothing.

I guess it depends on whose ox is gored.

LET RECORD SPEAK

It is revealing to follow the media's "feeding frenzy" on the Hebron massacre.

No one with normal feelings can condone such an act — no matter the excuse. I condemn it unhesitatingly and unequivocally. However, some pertinent facts should be noted:

Since September 1993, 23 Jews have been murdered by Palestinians.

[During the same period] over 30 Palestinians have been brutally murdered (over 1,000 since the Intifada), not by Israeli soldiers or settlers, but by Palestinians who call their victims "collaborators." Some of them may actually be spies, but most simply worked as postmen, clerks, etc., or (women) wore "immodest" clothes (short skirts, shorts or bathing suits), or were adultresses or even prostitutes! Obviously all were deserving of such punishment!

In the loud demands that all settlers be disarmed, not just the extremists, hardly anyone raises the obvious question: Why are all these people carrying guns wherever they go? I have a "reasonable" proposal for both sides. Let both sides be disarmed, i.e. the Palestinians can give up their guns, axes, stabbing knives. Then there will be no need for the settlers to carry weapons.

Finally, just a small historical note. When the Jews came to Hebron to "settle" after the 1967 war, the Arabs said the Jews had no right to intrude on Arab territory. Some still say the Tomb of the Patriarchs is only for Muslims, even though it is equally holy to Jews, and even to Christians. The fact is that there was a flourishing Jewish community in Hebron until the pogrom/massacre of many of these Jews in 1929. They were not allowed to return until the Israelis recaptured it from the then occupier, Jordan.

Of Schindler's tale and a 75th birthday

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

Schindler. What do Hawaii, New Jersey and Germany have in common? They all played recent roles in the ongoing journey of Spielberg's Schindler's List.

In Hawaii (about which I wrote last week, reporting on our month-long journey there) the number of Jews is small, but there are lots of other people who want to see the latest box-office sensation.

Only a few years ago, I remember, the market seemed to be tired of anything that had to do with the Holocaust, and some cognoscenti predicted a premature demise for Schindler's List. No longer. Hawaii is generally quite detached from much that goes on in the world, but this film bridges distance and time. Sometimes I think that even Spielberg is surprised at what he has brought off.

In New Jersey, an innovative Gentile woman has entered the company of active promoters. According to an AP dispatch, Gov. Christie Whitman had planned special showings of the film for college students throughout the state on the day Louis Farrakhan was to speak at Trenton State College. The papers reported what Farrakhan had to say: disavowing anti-Semitism from one side of his mouth and spouting it from the other. As of this writing (on the plane back home) I have not heard any report about the results of the governor's strategy.

It was the reception the film received in Germany which engaged my special interest. On March 2, the New York Times had an extensive report on the Frankfurt showing of the film, the first in the country.

It was a gala occasion. High officials attended; the opening was under the patronage of former President Richard von Weizsäcker, who enjoys phenomenal prestige in the country. He said to Spielberg: "[The film] needed you to do it."

The Times reported numerous reactions. A Protestant minister, who had befriended Oskar Schindler during his dog-days in the 1960s, commented: "On the whole, it succeeded in getting across a sense of what those events were really like, and posing the most important question: 'Where was every one else?' "

Rabbi Plaut

A Frankfurt lawyer, both of whose parents were saved by Schindler, saw the film with his mother. "I saw the millions who did not survive, and I was crying, and I saw the Germans who murdered and I was crying too. I hope a lot of Germans, particularly young Germans, will go see the film, which helps us to feel the Holocaust."

The Frankfurt Allgemeine Zeitung, one of Germany's influential dailies, hoped that everyone would see the picture and that it would move and excite the viewers. Der Spiegel, Germany's widely read weekly which is patterned after Time magazine, called it "great beyond all expectations. No book, no documentation, no film can grasp the horror and the incomprehensibility of the Holocaust. But Schindler's List — the first great movie that has really taken bureaucratically planned and factory-executed mass murder as its subject — shows what is possible to do: it is possible to tell the story."

Krakow, Poland, at whose outskirts Auschwitz is located, will be the show's next stop. I hope Polish and German movie goers alike will absorb the message which Schindler, via Spielberg, left behind.

A great anniversary: "Montreal, March 16, 1919, 3 o'clock. Monument National. On the afternoon the large auditorium of the Monument National was overfilled with two hundred delegates arriving from all parts of Canada ... and over 2,500 visitors. The auditorium was fittingly decorated with British, Canadian and Jewish flags — the orchestra played — an air of joyful expectancy and subdued enthusiasm filled the spacious hall. The curtain rose and the eyes beheld a compact group of school children, boys and girls, dressed in blue and white. Behind them were seen the figures of men about to take a leading part in the deliberations of the Congress."

The memo was written long ago by H. M. Caiserman, Canadian Jewish Congress general secretary from 1919-1950. This week, when Congress celebrates its 75th year, President Irving Abella will begin the anniversary observances at the very spot and at the exact day and hour, to signal the beginning of a nation-wide anniversary observances.

The 75 years of Congress have been filled with many achievements. They range over wide areas of vital interest to our community: advocacy on civic concerns before the public and government councils, giving voice and meaning to our love for Israel, issues of anti-Semitism, settlement of immigrants (in consort with JIAS), restitution (in consort with URO), Jewish education, Holocaust awareness, religious affairs, matters of social justice and human rights, and a host of other activities.

The Ontario region will continue the nationwide observances with a Plenary on March 19-20; the Quebec region's date is April 24, and other regions will follow with their own celebrations. A hearty mazel tov, and ken yirbu!

Rabbi Plaut is a past president of Congress.

EDITOR'S NOTE:

A printer's devil crept into Rabbi Plaut's column last week; as a result, it appeared that Kirk Cashmere was the owner of the building housing Temple Emanu-El. The sentence should have read: "Temple Emanu-El is the only Jewish property in Honolulu or anywhere on the islands, a lovely synagogue, with educational and social facilities and a very respectable library."

Continuity a serious challenge to Jamaican Jews

By BOAZ DVIR

The Jamaican Jewish community has managed since 1494 to gain a prominent place in society while struggling with such external threats as religious and political oppression. Yet it may succumb to an internal danger — assimilation.

The warning signs, according to two local Jewish leaders, include high intermarriage and low birth rates, continued emigration, lack of Jewish education and absence of Jewish organizations.

"I am very worried about the future," says Geoffrey de Sola Pinto, lay leader of the tiny Jewish community in Montego Bay.

On this tropical island, "Jewish continuity" sounds more like a Darwinian term than a fund-raising buzz-word.

The Jamaica Jewish population has been decreasing dramatically since the 19th century, when it reached 2,000.

Today, 250 mostly older assimilated Jews live in Jamaica, according to Ernest Desouza, lay rabbi of the island's only synagogue — Sharre Shalom United Congregation of Israelites in Kingston.

Desouza and Pinto point out that Jamaican Jews rarely marry each other.

"Most of the (Jamaican Jewish) families are so connected that young people don't want to marry each other. They'd feel like they're marrying their cousins," says Pinto, whose wife converted from Catholicism to Judaism after researching her Marrano roots.

The Marranos (Jews who kept their faith in secret to escape the wrath of the Spanish Inquisition) launched the local Jewish community 499 years ago when they arrived with Christopher Columbus.

When the conquering Protestant British lifted the sword of the Catholic Church in 1655, some Marranos unveiled Jamaica's first visible signs of Judaism. Many of them, however, never returned to their Spanish ancestors' glorified Jewish tradition.

Today, some non-Jews with Marrano roots end up marrying Jews, but only a few convert "back" to Judaism. Pinto says.

Besides, he adds, even if they all converted, they wouldn't post enough numbers to assure Jewish continuity on the island.

It seems that the Jamaican Jewish community's spineless back would probably fail to support a larger population, anyway.

The synagogue's sisterhood stopped meeting years ago.

The community's two Jewish groups — B'nai B'rith and the Women's International Zionist Organization (WIZO) — disappeared in the 1970s, along with hundreds of prominent Jews who were driven out by a new socialistic government.

"Economic uncertainty scared them away," Pinto says.

The two active organizations that still bear Jewish names and receive Jewish funding — the Hillel Academy elementary school and the Jewish Home for the Poor and the Aged — have few Jewish members.

Out of about 750 Hillel students, only a dozen are Jews. And they receive no Jewish education at this prestigious private school.

Lack of Jewish education, along with the other elements of assimilation, threaten Jamaica's Jewish future, says Is Aronin, adult education coordinator for the Academy of Jewish Studies in Boca Raton who visited this community a couple of years ago.

"I saw a community striving not to fall apart. But unfortunately, they're not doing great things," says Aronin, who met wth Desouza, while spending a week in Kingston and Ocho Rios.

Two Lubavitch representatives who recently visited Jamaica as part of their Caribbean travel-study showed even greater concern for the Jamaican Jewish community's esprit de corps, Pinto says.

They were "quite shaken up," says Pinto, who met with them for several hours.

Taking some of their criticism to heart, he decided to try to create a Jewish summer camp in Jamaica for kids from around the Caribbean islands. It would host children from such old-time Jewish communities as Barbados and St. Thomas (Virgin Islands).

"It would definitely do a great deal for Jewish continuity in the Caribbean," says Pinto, a London-born businessman who was unaware of his family's deep roots in Jamaica when he moved here from Quebec in 1957.

Conceding that this camp would certainly not be enough to "save" the Jamaican Jewish community, he says, "What else can you do?"

As if to answer his own question, Pinto adds that he's now organizing a group of about 25 Montego Bay Jews that will meet monthly for Sabbath morning services.

Even if he fails in one or both of his plans, Pinto will continue to stand as one of the community's two human pillars.

More traditional than religious, he keeps the flame of Judaism burning on the northwest side of the island by hosting Friday night dinners, Passover seders and other ritual and cultural events.

Desouza stands as the pillar on the southeast side of the island. A one-man show, he runs all aspects of the Kingston synagogue, conducts life-cycle events around the island and serves as the secretary of the Jamaican Jewish community.

After volunteering his services for 32 years while earning a living as a photographer, he has been a paid employee of the Jamaican Jewish community for the past 16 years.

"I have been carrying the bulk of the responsibility for 48 years," he says.

His family has been at it for close to 500 years, having arrived here from Spain in the early 1500s.

In 1655, they shed their mask of Catholicism and started practising Judaism openly. Along with others who became proud Jews, they built three synagogues, including one at the pirate town of Port Royal.

Today, only one temple still stands.

Built in 1885, Sharre Shalom United Congregation was destroyed 22 years later by an earthquake.

Rebuilt in 1912, the small synagogue is one of only four in the world that has sand on its floor, Pinto says.

It also has a mahogany ark and 200-year-old Torah scrolls topped with even older silver crowns.

Only about 4-12 kids show up on Sabbath mornings at the temple, which was once full of children, Desouza says.

Throughout Jamaica, only 15 Jews have yet to reach bar/bat mitzvah age.

Nevertheless, Desouza says that he is "not pessimistic" about the future.

"Jamaica is a developing country," he says. "In 10-20 years from now, people will move here."

Preparing for Passover is pure physical torture

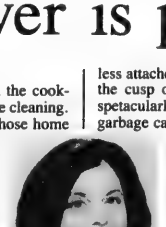
By ERICA MEYER RAUZIN

Passover presents many serious challenges, such as trying to really feel the experience of the Exodus, trying to learn the meaning of this pivotal saga in our peoples' history, trying to understand the miraculous events described in the Torah . . . and, trying to get the house ready.

And if the first three are metaphysically more difficult, the fourth is pure physical torture: every shelf, every drawer, every corner and cubby has to be emptied, cleaned, and then refilled with all its contents, themselves cleaned and fresh. The household operations involved thunder in on the heels of Purim and don't recede until the children hunt for chometz with their father while old Mom contemplates 40 for dinner.

The holiday is complicated this year because the seders are Saturday and Sunday night. On Saturday — Shabbat — one can't cook. On Sunday, which is yom tov, one can prepare food in some limited ways, but believe me when I tell you that starting on Tuesday night would be a great deal simpler.

However, I'm not worrying about the cooking yet. I'm too busy fretting about the cleaning. If I were one of those housewives whose home is always pristine, then cleaning for Passover would be a pro forma exercise: dust everything off, shake everything out, and proceed without a care in the world. But I am not one of those housewives.



Erica Meyer Rauzin

I am the kind of housewife who can throw a sheet over a pile of packing boxes and "not see it" for months. I am the kind of housewife who hoards newspapers, catalogues, magazines, children's art work, and miscellaneous mail, all in stacks, all over the place. I am the kind of housewife who believes in the concept of the buried elephant: if you can't spot it — in the closet, under the stairs — then, it's not there. But Passover shouts at me, yes it is there, and you have to tidy it up or throw it out.

Somehow, the closer we get to Passover, the less attached I feel to my stacks and hoards. On the cusp of the holiday, everything that isn't spetacularly beautiful, historic or meaningful is garbage can fodder, no quarter given, no questions asked, no mercy shown.

The unfortunate repercussion of this policy is that I spend the month after Passover looking for things I've thrown out.

I have certain allies in my Passover clean up: hired assistants, motherly support, effective chemicals. But I also have certain enemies: my children. The process begins when I suggest that my daughters go through their closets and drawers, discarding things they will never wear again, can't fit into any more, haven't worn in a year, or don't really like. By the time they have completed this effort — if, indeed, I can get them to undertake it — they are completely used up and not available for other tasks. This is improving as they get older, but basically the scouring, scrubbing, sorting gig is mine, and mine alone.

I don't mind doing the living room: it is relatively organized and open. The rooms I mind (like the master bedroom) are ones with lots of nooks and crannies, multiple hidey-holes where anything can lurk — and does.

I'm also not wild about doing my 4-year-old son's room. He hoards treasures, too, but he and I disagree on what constitutes a treasure. For instance, I do not think a dried-out lizard belongs in that category, but he does. I would also disallow headless dinosaurs, pieceless jigsaw puzzles, random toy men from random train and castle sets, and anything smelly, squishy or unidentifiable. To him, mysterious odoriferous squishiness adds to an object's value. He can't imagine why I don't think the more squishy, the more stinky, the better, but that's his philosophy and he's standing by it.

Given that kind of support, I plunge into Passover cleaning with one eye over my shoulder, looking out for sabotage. And while I scrub and sweep, sort and mop, I know my son is just around the corner trying to add to the holiday in his own way, searching for treasures so he can proudly present something smelly, something soft, something wonderful, just for me, just now.

Memory of Holocaust was suppressed

Reporting from St. Petersburg and Minsk, Sheldon Kirshner looks at the Holocaust in the former Soviet Union.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

More than two million Soviet Jews died in the Holocaust, the vast majority in Ukraine, Belarus and Russia.

And yet information about the Holocaust as a Jewish tragedy was all but repressed by the former Communist authorities.

As late as 1991, the year the Soviet Union collapsed as an entity, a Jewish researcher in St. Petersburg named Aleksandr Frenkel could write: "A state policy of anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union... led to almost complete oblivion of the memory of the victims of the Nazi genocide."

Memorials supposedly dedicated in their honor rarely contained references to Jews. Instead, monuments memorialized "Soviet people" who had perished during the fascist occupation.

Jews bold enough to complain were accused of being narrow and divisive bourgeois nationalists bent on separating the Holocaust from the deaths of millions of Soviet citizens in World War II.

Sometimes, the lengths to which the regime went to erase symbols of the Holocaust bordered on the ludicrous. On some tombstones, the lower triangles on Magen Davids were scratched out, thus deracinating them. In other instances, Yiddish inscriptions were removed.

In 1943, the Soviet government established a committee to investigate Nazi war crimes. However, eyewitness accounts and documents that had been laboriously collected were sealed.

In general, publications on the Holocaust were taboo. Shortly after the war, Josef Stalin ordered the destruction of the master copy of The Black Book, an unpublished text which documented the destruction of Soviet Jewish communities. As a result of a political thaw in the early 1960s, several Holocaust-related books were published, notably The Diary of Anne Frank. Otherwise, nothing.

Media shows little interest, says activist

At schools and universities, the Holocaust was deemed unfit to be taught. It was simply a non-subject. And when the Holocaust was broached, as in the case of Babi Yar, the site of a Nazi massacre in Kiev, it was cynically drained of its Jewish content.

In the final indignity, Jewish survivors throughout the Soviet empire were denied access to German reparation funds.

With the advent of glasnost and perestroika in the mid-1980s, the official prohibition against the Holocaust gradually withered away.

In 1988, the Holocaust Research Group was founded by Frenkel and his colleague, Daniel Romanofsky, who has since made aliyah. Its purpose was to collect oral recollections of survivors, build Holocaust memorials, and repair and update existing ones.

Frenkel and Romanofsky conducted their first round of interviews in towns such as Mogilov, Vitebsk, Smolensk, Pskov and Bryansk.

In the same year, the Holocaust Research Group sponsored the first known photographic exhibition on the Holocaust. Not open to the general public, it was held in a private apartment in St. Petersburg. The photographs, taken by members of the team, were of killing fields and memorials.

Later that year, the first official exhibit took place in St. Petersburg Choral Synagogue.

The Courage to Remember, an American Holocaust exhibition, was shown in 1989 in Moscow.

All three exhibitions drew large crowds. "For the post-war Jewish generation, the Holocaust was a Jewish consciousness-raising event," said Frenkel, a 32-year-old hydraulic engineer who's chair of the Holocaust Research Group and acting chair of the Jewish Association of St. Petersburg. "In a sense, (Soviet) Jews became aware of their Jewish heritage through their knowledge of the Holocaust."

Frenkel himself began to learn of the enormity of the Holocaust a little more than a decade ago.

"I knew next to nothing about the Holocaust until then," said the slight figure with the trimmed brown beard, blue jeans and a heavy sweater.

"At school, I heard nothing," he added.

All that changed when Frenkel and his fellow Jewish activists came into possession of English-language books on the Holocaust given to them by overseas Jewish tourists.

Intent on disseminating this information to a wider audience, Frenkel and his friends broke the law by illegally translating some of these books, including Lucy Davidowicz's The War Against the Jews, into Russian samizdats.

Today, Frenkel is one of Russia's leading Holocaust authorities. In his bookcase are such classics as Schindler's List, Beyond Belief and The Yellow Star.

Under his direction, the Holocaust Research Group works to convince municipalities to build memorials and maintain existing monuments. In his estimation, there are 70 Holocaust memorials in all of Russia, five built since perestroika.

Perhaps 10 refer to Jews, either directly or indirectly. In the town of Roslavl, south of Smolensk, one side of a memorial refers to the victims' "Jewish nationality.". The other side is blank. In Smolensk, an inscription honors "prisoners of the ghetto."

"Who can this be?" said Frenkel sarcastically.

Frenkel is particularly proud of the group's stylized Holocaust monument in Pushkin, near St. Petersburg. The site of a czarist summer estate, Pushkin was once home to some 1,000 Jews. The German army captured the town in September 1941 and, within weeks, nearly all its Jewish inhabitants were murdered.

According to Frenkel, Pushkin was the northernmost place where Jews were exterminated. The Holocaust memorial there was erected in October 1991 with the approval of the town council.

To his regret, Frenkel doubts whether the Russian government is interested in erecting Holocaust memorials. "Russia is not ready for this. Yeltsin has not even made a public statement against anti-Semitism," he said, in a reference to Russian President Boris Yeltsin.

The reverse is true in other ex-Soviet republics, such as Ukraine and Latvia, because they have a greater appreciation of public relations.

Frenkel has tried, but failed, to interest the Russian media in Holocaust monuments. However, some Russian periodicals have published articles on Yad Vashem, Israel's Holocaust memorial cum-museum in Jerusalem.

Today, Frenkel is hard at work on other projects designed to perpetuate the memory of the Holocaust in Russia.

He has asked the Ministry of Education to introduce a Holocaust curriculum. "They are interested in the idea, but only if it's presented within the context of the anti-fascist struggle."

Contemplating the future, Frenkel wants to organize regular school trips to Holocaust memorials. "It's important to give students a feeling that the Holocaust was real and that it happened right here in Russia."

Magen Davids defaced during Soviet era

As well, Frenkel is working on a plan to publish a guide, with maps, on Holocaust sites throughout the country.

Frenkel lauds the appearance of the first Russian edition of Elie Wiesel's novel, Night. It was published last August and, in the view of observers, ushers in a new age of Holocaust awareness here.

He is pleased that Yad Vashem has been granted permission to examine Holocaust data in Russian archives in Moscow. The agreement, signed last year, is expected to throw new light on Nazi war crimes and perhaps on the fate of Raoul Wallenberg, the Swedish diplomat who saved thousands of Hungarian Jews and who disappeared in Budapest at war's end.

And Frenkel is gratified that, finally, Jews in Russia, Ukraine and Belarus will be eligible for German reparation payments, worth approximately $600 million (US). Germany's gesture was announced during the 50th anniversary of the Warsaw ghetto uprising last year.

* * *

Belarus, formerly Belorussia, is soaked with Jewish blood.

Almost 400,000 Jews, 80,000 from Minsk, the capital, were killed during the Holocaust, according to Yacov Bassin, vice-president of Minsk's Jewish community.

German forces entered Minsk on June 28, 1941, and soon established a ghetto. A Jewish resistance group, led by Hersh Smolar, emerged. With its assistance, 10,000 Jews managed to escape. On Oct. 21, 1943, the ghetto was liquidated.

Thanks to funds collected by the Jewish community, an obelisk dedicated to the Holocaust was erected in Minsk in 1946. It was the first such monument in the Soviet Union. The inscription was in Russian and Yiddish.

In 1952, with Stalin's anti-Jewish campaign in full swing, the memorial's stone engraver was arrested. He spent eight months in prison, Bassin said.

In the 1970s, at the height of the Cold War, the authorities tried to pull down the memorial. But Jewish protests nipped that plan in the bud.

Last October, the 50th anniversary of the ghetto's destruction was marked by a ceremony in Minsk attended by Jewish representatives, Belarus government officials and foreign diplomats (including the ambassadors of Israel and Germany).

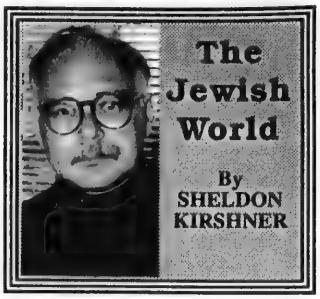
After the unveiling of a new memorial, a series of commemorative events took place — climaxed by a Jewish book fair at the National Library and a Holocaust exhibition at the Museum of World War II.

Never before had the Belarus government lavished so much attention, and respect, on the Holocaust.

Nevertheless, observers wonder whether the powers-that-be have really adopted an entirely new attitude to the greatest tragedy to befall the Jewish people.

Russian Holocaust memorial in Nevel, circa 1987. Note that the Magen David's sixth point is missing.

In 1992, the Star of David was restored.



Books of Jewish interest...

Have you ever wondered when and why the Jewish people adopted the Star of David — the Magen David — as a national insignia? This question piqued Rabbi Gunther Plaut's curiosity in 1945 as American forces nearing the Rhine River prepared for the final assault on Nazi Germany.

Rabbi Plaut, now senior scholar at Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto and then a soldier in the U.S. army, stumbled upon a bombed-out church with one intact window whose sole design was the Star of David. He was rightly puzzled, since the Magen David is normally recognized as a symbol of Judaism.

Years later, Rabbi Plaut took it upon himself to probe the origins of the Star of David, a geometric figure known as a hexagram. Perhaps, to his surprise, he discovered that the hexagram is a widely-used symbol. It's found in Islamic manuscripts, and in colonial Africa, the British minted a coin which featured a six-pointed star.

Hexagrams, he informs us in The Magen David (B'nai B'rith Books, $12.95 U.S.), appeared first in a distinctly Jewish setting in the seventh century BCE In the 14th century, the Magen David was used in an official capacity by the Jews of Prague. In 19th century Germany, the Magen David adorned synagogues, and in Eastern Europe, it denoted freedom from Czarist oppression.

After 1897, the Zionist movement enshrined it as its insignia, and subsequently, the Magen David became inextricably bound up with Jews.

The United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, inaugurated in April 1993 on the 50th anniversary of the Warsaw ghetto revolt, is a beacon of remembrance.

The World Must Know (Little, Brown, $50) is a photographic album of the story this museum tells. Both a chronicle of Jewish life in Europe before the Holocaust and of the Final Solution, it is by turns nostalgic and horrific. The writer of the text is the museum's project director, Michael Berenbaum. The photographs are graphic, sometimes sickeningly so.

Cornucopia of books

Some 15,000 children passed through the portals of the Terezin concentration camp from 1942 to 1944. Not more than 100 survived the ordeal. All that is left of these children are their drawings and poems, which are showcased poignantly in ... I Never Saw Another Butterfly... (Random House, $31.50).

The original edition, published in 1964, has been updated and includes new illustrations and poems. It's powerful stuff. Consider these lines:

Who was toughened up before,
He'll survive these days.
But who was used to servants
Will sink into his grave.

Young readers will surely appreciate Sharon Lennea's Raoul Wallenberg (Jewish Publication Society of America, $9.95). Based on archival materials and first-person interviews with Wallenberg's family, his colleagues and the Hungarian Jews he saved, Raoul Wallenberg is illustrated with photographs taken by his personal photographer, Tom Veres. This affecting biography is written for children 10 and older.

In 1988, Morris Dees — a noted American civil rights lawyer — was retained by the family of an Ethiopian man who had been murdered by racists in Portland, Oregon. Dees, a white Alabamian whose parents had been poor cotton farmers, proved in a landmark case that the skinheads who killed the Ethiopian were linked directly to and were acting on behalf of the notorious white supremacist, Tom Metzger.

Hate on Trial (Villard Books, $26.50) is Dees' account of the trial, and his attempt to understand the wellsprings of racism. It's an intelligent, deeply-felt book.

Lucien Wolf is a forgotten figure today, but during World War I this British Jewish communal leader had an effect on two central events — the Balfour Declaration, which formally recognized the right of Jews to establish a national homeland in Palestine, and the Minorities Treaty, which endorsed a framework for Jewish existence in Europe.

In War, Jews and the New Europe (Oxford University Press, $50 U.S.), a dense analysis of Wolf's role in an ever-shifting political landscape, scholar Mark Levene puts his contributions in historic perspective.

By RABBI IRA GRUSSGOTT

Many people are put off by the third book of the Pentateuch, Leviticus (Vayikra). Half of the book is devoted to the sacrificial offerings, the mysterious tumah and taharah (spiritual states of impurity and purity) and rules and regulations dealing with diet. This is the point in the Torah reading cycle where rabbis really have it rough. What's there to talk about?

We tend to overlook the fact that it is in this book that we find those sublime verses which express such ethical doctrines of Judaism as: "Proclaim ye liberty throughout the land . . ." and "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

But still we must admit, after reading the stirring stories of our patriarchs in Genesis and after following the national drama of our people that unfolds in Exodus, that there is a letdown, indeed a lack of tolerance and outright impatience, when we arrive at Vayikra with all of its rituals.

But Vayikra is just as important as the stirring stories of Genesis and Exodus and just as significant as the dramatic discourses of Numbers and Deuteronomy. Vayikra reminds us that ritual relates to the human experience, and indeed as its placement in the Pentateuch suggests, it is central to our lives.

Look at what is happening today. Everyone talks about "freedom" and "justice" and "mercy" and "brotherly love." The political posterings and nationalistic trappings of the Winter Olympics in Lillehammer provide a telling illustration. North Korea calls itself a "People's Republic." Likewise China. The Montreal Gazette recently ran an item on Turkey. The country is now officially regarded as representing the modern, tolerant, enlightened elements of Islam. The coverage conveniently overlooked Turkey's continuing conflict with the Kurds — 4,000 killed in 1993 alone.

Principles are one thing, practice quite another. This is human nature.

The Torah recognizes our fragile nature, and to avoid this pitfall, it introduces the discipline of Halachah. Through special rituals and detailed commandments, the lofty principles of our Torah are brought down to earth and actualized. No amount of abstract speculation about freedom can do as much to further that idea as observing the seder in the traditional manner. Soon we will be busying ourselves buying matzah. But part of matzah's ritual with its recitation of "ha lachma anya" calls for sharing, and so through the seder, the ideal of freedom is realized. Without the seder how often would we invite the needy to our homes? Left to our own devices how often would we give charity? Not how much but how often? Would we give charity twice a day? People who come to minyan do. Again, the amount is not significant, the habitual practice of the act is.

The laws of Vayikra are detailed and revolve around sacrifices; they remind us that part of being a good Jew means paying attention to the details of life and attending to them in a spirit of sacrifice.

Too often people express a fallacious philosophy of Judaism. Some see it as evolving from a lowly "Priestly" cult to a higher "Prophetic" religion. To see the two as conflicting or contending with each other is to distort the essence of traditional Judaism. Our Torah is at once priestly and prophetic. To deny the priestly aspect is to deny that part of our human nature which says there is a need to translate ideals into action. Professor Nechama Leibowitz remarks that this narrative of animal sacrifices follows the story of the Golden Calf as a natural sequence. It was as if God Himself were saying that ritual needed to be introduced to serve as an outlet for human expression and an alternative to human folly.

Significantly, albeit belatedly, even the exponents of Prophetic Judaism find it hard to deny the powerful pull of the "Priestly" aspect. More and more of our young people who come back to Judaism are in fact first attracted to its ritual, its aspect of observance. Of course our young are idealistic but they need a vehicle, a mode of expressing their ideals.

Halachah is the means toward this end.

The book of Vayikra (Leviticus) with its emphasis on ritual detail is very much an integral part of our Torah, as much as any stirring story in Genesis or Exodus, as much as any dramatic rhetoric in Deuteronomy. Of the Five Books of Moses it stands at the centre. Let's make its lessons more central to our lives.

Rabin gets needed support

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin moved an important step closer to broadening his fragile coalition government last week when a hard-fought piece of legislation was virtually assured of passage by the Knesset.

The fervently Orthodox Shas party earlier last week had agreed to rejoin the Labor-led government but conditioned its return on the passage of a bill that would pave the way for banning the importation of non-kosher meat.

In mid-February, the bill passed a preliminary vote in the Knesset, and last Wednesday it appeared there were enough votes to ensure final passage.

But Meretz — which had made a number of concessions to Shas before the Orthodox party left the coalition last fall — is now prepared for yet another concession in order to give the Rabin government the parliamentary support it needs to put the peace process firmly back on track.

Shas left the coalition when its political leader, former Interior Minister Aryeh Deri, was indicted on charges of bribery, fraud and breach of public trust.

Also obliged to vote for the religious legislation, though from the opposition benches, were the other Orthodox parties, United Torah Judaism and the National Religious Party. Almost in spite of themselves, they thus made it possible for Rabin to widen his coalition before leaving for an important trip to the United States this week.

What is still not clear is whether Rabin will undertake additional negotiations to further broaden his governing coalition.

Earlier last week, he seemed on the brink of a serious breach with Meretz and members of his own Labor party over his negotiations with the right-wing Tsomet Party, which he had also been trying to woo into the coalition.

Skinhead gets four years for attack on Sri Lankan

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A racist skinhead whose unprovoked attack left a Sri Lankan immigrant partially paralyzed was sentenced last week to four years in a federal penitentiary.

Calling Jason Hoolans "a street thug" whose attack was racially motivated, Ontario Court Judge Hugh Locke said "a message must go out to the public that the streets are protected for those who obey the law. . . Our streets are not for criminals."

In sentencing Hoolans, Locke pointed out that the racist element served to "aggravate the sentence." He imposed the four-year term after considering that Hoolans had already spent nine months in jail awaiting trial.

Locke rejected defence lawyer Daniel Brodsky's submission that a two-year term followed by three years of probation would best serve the community's interest in deterrence.

"Hoolans is a violent young man [who] remains a danger to society. . . He and others of his ilk prowled the streets of Toronto looking for victims" who were non-white, Locke said.

In addressing the court prior to sentencing, Crown attorney Michael Leshner called for a five-year jail term, saying society must be protected from "vicious animals prowling the streets."

Hoolans, wearing steel-pointed boots, kicked the victim, Sivarajah Vinasithamby, twice in the head "simply because he was a person of color," Leshner said. "It could have been any other target group."

In a taped interview with police that was shown in court, Hooolans said he would like to see a white Canada operated "in a fascist line." Court also heard about Hoolans' tattoos, which include the Maltese Cross with a symbol of the SS, and a Celtic Cross, symbol of the racist skinhead movement.

Leshner pointed out that in 1991, Hoolans was convicted of an aggravated assault in which he and another attacker assaulted another skinhead, kicking him an estimated 100 to 150 times.

After receiving an 18-month sentence for that assault, Hoolans apologized to the victim and expressed remorse for what he had done. Yet that did not prevent him from later searching out an innocent victim and administering a savage beating, Leshner said.

Hoolans, 20, who has grown his hair longer and who wore a suit in court, sat impassively in the prisoner's box as the sentence was handed down. Earlier, he had testified about the events leading up to the attack.

Hoolans said he began drinking heavily at age 13 or 14, as well as using drugs and sniffing glue. At around the same time, he became attracted to racist groups. "They seemed so proud [like] they belonged to an empire," he said. It was "like a militia."

He said he became immersed in listening to racist rock groups like Brutal Attack and reading racist materials.

Vinasithamby, a mathematics teacher in his native Sri Lanka, suffered a brain hemorrhage and remains partially paralyzed on his left side. A medical report read in court indicated he will likely be permanently disabled and will continue to suffer "intellectual impairments."

In a sometimes emotional statement prior to sentencing, Hoolans repeatedly expressed remorse for the incident and apologized to Vinasithamby and his family. He broke into tears when describing the pain he had caused his father.

Hoolans said that during the nine months he spent in the Don (Toronto) Jail he's re-evaluated his life and wants to put it in a new direction, including convincing other skinheads to change their ways.

After sentencing, Brodsky said he was disappointed that the judge had not accepted his recommendation that he place Hoolans on probation and give him the opportunity to go back to the community of skinheads to speak to them and try to turn them away from their racist beliefs.

Farber, who testified as an expert witness on anti-Semitism and hate groups, said "it's not enough for a person who has gone so far down the line of hatred to stand up in court and say he's reformed himself." He commended Locke for imposing a sentence "that demonstrates that racially-motivated crimes will not be tolerated."

Beth Emeth buys $1 million Bond

TORONTO — You might call it a 20 million dollar anniversary.

For the twentieth consecutive year, Toronto's Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue has purchased a million dollar note, which is part of the Israel Bonds program. It is in effect a bank loan, guaranteed by the government of Israel, which receives the million dollars in proceeds. Although the bank charges interest for the note, Israel pays interest, just as it does with Bonds. The net result for State of Israel Bonds has been $20 million dollars over 20 years.

Each year, with the help of Jimmy Graff, David Anisman, a past president of Beth Emeth, has been organizing a fundraising dinner to finance the difference between what is owing on the note and interest received from Israel. Any extra funds collected are directed toward other charities, such as the Jerusalem College of Technology (JCT), which has been the beneficiary for three years.

"The proceeds will fulfil a dream that is about to become a reality: the construction of a new dormitory building," said Henry Zieleniec, who co-chairs Canadian Friends of JCT.

The idea of purchasing notes, then running annual events to pay for the interest and more, was spearheaded by Anisman, who categorically rejects claims that Israel no longer needs Bonds.

"Israel needs the money," he asserted, "and they know what to do with it."

Next year, Anisman expects to be back at the dinner table, even though, he admitted, he sometimes feels like letting go.

"I've been saying for 19 years that I'm not going to do it any more, and next year, I probably will again."

Vancouver JFSA seeks grant to aid newcomers

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The Jewish Family Service Agency has applied for a $25,000 grant through the British Columbia Settlement Grants Program to help with the integration of new immigrants into the community.

Barry Corrin, executive director of the agency, said his organization, which has received such grants in the past, puts emphasis on integration. "We try to get them involved in the community," he said. "We help the immigrants put their kids in Jewish schools and we encourage families to join synagogues. We deal with people who in most cases have jobs but have not yet joined in community activities. We encourage them to become volunteers and to mix wholeheartedly in community life."

Under its Multiculturalism B.C. program, the government offers the grants to organizations which provide direct settlement services to new immigrants in B.C. communities. Organizations must be registered as non-profit groups.

The Jewish Family Service Agency, which is funded mainly by the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver, represents the Jewish Immigrant Aid Society (JIAS) in Vancouver.

Ramah program aids 'disabled' children

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

The Tikvah program for campers with special needs is all set to run at Camp Ramah in Canada again this year, after its successful inauguration last summer.

The program, which is modelled after similar Tikvah programs in Ramah camps in California, Wisconsin and New England, enables Jewish adolescents with learning and other developmental disabilities to participate fully with other campers, in the experiences of a summer at Camp Ramah.

Dr. Mitch Parker, director of the program, and an educational psychologist who has been involved with Camp Ramah as a counsellor and teacher says that last summer was the first time many of the nine Tikvah campers had been involved in an integrated program. "There was a lot of skepticism during staff week but it all disappeared quickly. Within a week, the Tikvah campers were totally accepted."

He says that one of the program's goals is to have its participants develop a positive Jewish identity. "The campers learn what it means to be Jewish through concrete hands-on activities. They participate in daily and Shabbat services, take part in Jewish living classes, learn Hebrew through song and dance and become part of the vibrant Jewish milieu of the camp. We really discovered that this goal was attained, when a camper in last summer's regular program, said in her bat mitzvah speech, that she didn't realize what Kavanah, the ability to concentrate on prayer and God, really meant, until she saw one of the Tikvah campers read from the Torah."

Other program objectives include strengthening self-sufficiency and self-esteem, providing as inclusive a program as each camper can comfortably manage and making sure that the camping experience is safe, nurturing and challenging. "Part of the philosophy of the Tikvah program is to encourage each camper to be as independent as he or she can be, and mastery of daily living skills is encouraged. A sense of success is fostered in each camper," says Parker.

He adds that, as in the other Ramah camps, the Tikvah program not only benefits the Tikvah campers themselves, but educates and sensitizes the entire camp community to the needs of others. "Tikvah is the Hebrew word for hope and we are proud to provide programing that will bring new hope and opportunities for Jewish and human growth to many families throughout our region."

Parker says that a letter he received from a mother whose son was a Tikvah camper last summer is testament to the success of the program. "In all our experience in these matters, we have never felt such careful philosophical and moral consideration given to a special needs program. The issues of when to and when not to integrate, how much and how little to explain to other campers, how much or little independence to give, how to teach, learn and enjoy, the provision of normal camping activities, the selection and training of staff and finally the generalized inclusion that was apparent throughout the camp, all happens successfully because of a job extremely well done," she wrote.

Letter testament to program's success

With a welcome grant from the Bequest and Endowment Fund, United Jewish Welfare Fund of Toronto, the Tikvah program hopes to be able to take 12 campers this summer. "We plan to give the older kids jobs and responsibilities around the camp such as sorting mail and helping in the dining hall. Everyone is looking forward to another successful summer," says Parker.

Primacy of Torah said essential for all Jews

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There is nothing wrong with arguments over differing religious viewpoints, providing they rest on a "rock-bottom acceptance" of the primacy of Torah, says well-known writer, teacher and scholar Rabbi Shlomo Riskin.

Rabbi Riskin, chief rabbi of the city of Efrat in Israel, dean of the Or Torah system of schools and a leading advocate of religious pluralism, was giving the David and Lois Buckstein Endowed Lecture at Beth Tzedec Congregation recently.

The Talmud, he explained, when ruling on a disagreement between the philosophical schools of Hillel and Shammai, called both "the words of the living G-d," even while accepting the opinions of Hillel.

"It is impossible not to be awed by the ... respect by rabbis for different opinions," he said.

He lamented that this same respect does not exist now, even within Orthodox circles, let alone between Orthodoxy and the other streams of Judaism.

"We have lost the ability to disagree and still maintain respect. This is essential, both within a family and between people."

This said, Rabbi Riskin criticized the Conservative and Reform movements for "giving Halachah a vote [in religious decisions], rather than a veto."

While Hillel and Shammai might interpret laws differently, they nevertheless accepted the fact that there was a law, which must be accepted.

The Talmud felt if there were not acceptance of Halachah, "then everything would become permissable. And that's what happened, and we can't accept that."

Homosexuality, which is under intense discussion in the Conservative and Reform movements, is one example, Rabbi Riskin said.

"Judaism can accept and understand an individual, without in any way condoning their actions," the rabbi said.

"Jewish law does not hold a homosexual person as culpable. But homosexuality is outlawed as a legitimate alternative lifestyle, as [Torah] ultimately believes that a relationship that can't lead to children and grandchildren can't lead to satisfaction."

Unlike western society, he said "Judaism takes a strong stand — homosexuality is beyond the pale."

Conversion is another, perhaps more basic area of disagreement.

While there may be arguments over whether or not one can use electricity on Shabbat, he said as an example, whatever side a person comes down on, "my son can still marry your daughter."

But, he said, when the Reform movement accepts patrilinial descent (contrary to the Talmudic dictum that Jewish status is determined by the mother) and doesn't demand ritual immersion, acceptance of the commandments or circumcision for men as essential for conversion, "suddenly there is an unbridgable chasm, and the Jewish people are torn apart."

Still, Rabbi Riskin said he supports the introduction of Conservative and Reform to Israel, saying it would strengthen Orthodoxy to have healthy competition.

Beth Tzedec's Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, who acted as a facilitator for Rabbi Riskin's presentation, pointed out that Rabbi Aaron Soloveitchik, one of the deans of Orthodoxy, refuses to accept Conservative conversions, even if the Beth Din performing them "is Shomer Shabbat, and has yirat shomayim (fear of G-d). Rabbi Soloveitchik calls them evil."

While admitting he himself would accept a conversion from such a Beth Din, Riskin that at the Jewish Theological Seminary, the Conservative rabbinical seminary, halachic decisions can be "voted on even by people who do not observe Halachah," and this situation, he suggested, lessens the acceptability of all Conservative rabbis.

Both rabbis deplored the gulf between religious and secular Jews in Israel.

Rabbi Riskin said the gulf is so wide that "Hashomair Hatzair (a left-wing, secular movement) kibbutzim have all their baby boys circumcised. If Rabbi Porush (a stalwart member of Agudath Israel, who sits in the Knesset) suggested making circumcision a law, they would immediately stop doing it."

People have to be encouraged to follow Halachah, Rabbi Riskin said, not coerced.

Jews, he feels, are looking for spirituality in their lives. While this is leading to a return to traditionalism, there is also intermarriage and alienation.

Many have not been exposed to "healthy, non-fanatic, non-cultic" Judaism, Rabbi Riskin charged. He urged Jews "to Shabbes — as a verb," stressing Shabbat as a day when the family sits together, and sings together.

The food, the aromas, the songs, the dialogue, provide the glue to keep the family together, he said, adding that "my six-foot son, who is now serving in the Golani brigade, calls every Friday evening for a brachah."

The Shabbat experience is not only an Orthodox one, he said. "Any serious return to serious Judaism, where Shabbat is for studying and family rather than for golf and shopping, is to be applauded."

B.C. helps fight racism

VICTORIA — The government of British Columbia has added $10,000 to the funds of the Greater Victoria Race Relations Council to help fight racism in the Victoria area. The council was set up last year and has already received a $10,000 grant from the Greater Victoria Regional District.

The government cheque was presented by Victoria MLA Gretchen Brewin to Michael Peters and Walter Quon at a recent meeting in the Legislative Building.

Brewin said the impetus to set up a race relations council began when she was mayor of the city several years ago and the idea came to fruition last year. She said she had stressed the need to the Federation of Municipalities and to the police commission.

CJC Pacific region seeks end to discriminatory practices

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Canadian Jewish Congress Pacific region wants British Columbia to pass a law against discriminatory business practices, a move supported by the Liberal Opposition in the legislature.

The legislature is scheduled to open later this month.

Pacific region leaders met with Val Anderson, a Vancouver MLA and chair of the Liberal caucus. Anderson is also the Liberal critic for human rights and multiculturalism.

"He promised full support for a Discriminatory Act and agreed with us that it's time for B.C. to fall in line with Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario, which have this legislation," said Herb Silber, legal counsel for Congress.

"We've been trying to get this law for years," Silber told The CJN, "and we're optimistic that we may finally succeed."

A bill proposing the act would have to be introduced in the legislature by the NDP majority government. "There's no commitment from the government ... but we think there's a possibility, and we're pleased the Opposition will support it," said Silber.

It is legal for British Columbian businesses to adhere to the Arab boycott and "sporadic instances of this are reported to us," he said.

Silber added that the Arab League has in no way relented in easing up on the boycott.

Silber said both Ontario and Manitoba have specific legislation against discriminatory trade practices. In Saskatchewan this comes under the Human Rights Act. In those provinces firms which break the law can be barred from doing business with their governments.

Also discussed at the meeting with Anderson was anti-Semitism, multiculturalism and immigration, all of which are included in his job as Liberal critic.

Soviet students change with times

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The economies of Russia and Ukraine may be in a very deep hole but, according to University of Manitoba professor Larry Gould, students are eagerly signing up for new, business-oriented university courses to learn how to operate in a free market economy.

"A lot of progress is being made in business education," said Gould, head of the Department of Accounting and Finance in the university's Faculty of Management. "The former Soviet universities are restructuring their business education to accommodate themselves to a free market economy. The students want to learn how to make money."

Originally from St. Louis, Gould taught at McMaster University in Hamilton before coming to the U of M nine years ago. In early 1991, he was a visiting professor at the University of Lvov teaching a course on finance.

"Ukraine was still part of the USSR at that time," he recalled. "The university was trying to start a Western-style MBA program. That was revolutionary. They were looking for assistance in developing a curriculum. There were not many teachers of finance in the Soviet Union. Very few people had any concept of interest on money earned for example."

Gould was in Lvov for one month. He came back with an idea of an exchange program and undertook to raise money for it. As he became more involved, he saw the need for business programs throughout the Soviet Union.

"To help the peoples of the former Soviet Union establish a market economy, it is necessary to help them establish business programs in their universities similar to ours in North America.

Planned economy

"Their universities are geared to a planned economy. If you believe that education is useful in business, then management programs are lacking."

Gould successfully applied to the External Affairs Department's Task Force for Central and Eastern Europe (now called the Bureau of Assistance for Central and Eastern Europe) and is now heading a U of M program operating in the University of Finance and Economics in St. Petersburg and the Russian Economic Academy in Moscow — the top business institutes in Russia, Gould says — and the Kiev State University of Economics and the Ivan Franko University in Lvov.

"We have assigned 12 of our faculty members to teach at the Russian and Ukrainian universities for one-month periods in areas where they are lacking teaching expertise. We are helping them develop curriculum and bringing over their faculty members for six month upgrading programs at the University of Manitoba."

Gould and his colleagues are trying to broaden the program to include more universities in the former Soviet Union. Although the Ukrainian and Russian universities have gone a long way to incorporating new business techniques, he says, they are under heavy economic pressure and salaries for professors are relatively low.

Ukraine in particular is facing severe economic difficulties, he reports. Although Russia is much farther along in its privatization efforts, investment is slow because of concerns about the political situation.

"Both countries have a long way to go," Gould said. "The results of the Russian elections pose a major problem for the speed of reform."

On his last visit to Russia and Ukraine, Gould visited synagogues in Kiev and Moscow. "The people seemed friendly," he said. "My own family's roots are in Kiev. From a personal standpoint, it is hard not to be concerned by the stature and impact of [new Russian leader Vladimir] Zhirinovsky."

A Wilderness Passover
by Kathleen Cook Waldron illustrations by Leslie Gould

LAST NIGHT Louie led the search with a candle. Susan followed with a goose feather and Papa with a wooden spoon and a bag. They were searching for any bread, cake, cookie or cracker crumbs left in the house.

The kitchen glistened in the candlelight as Susan swept the last crumbs into Papa's wooden spoon. After their first winter in the mountains at Ruby Lake, Louie's family was finally ready for Passover.

Or so it seemed....

PASSOVER FOOD

Creative Pesach baking without the leavening

By LESLIE MICHLIN BORDEN
Special to The CJN

Each year, the head of the household starts the Passover seder by holding up a piece of matzoh, saying, "This is the bread of our affliction, which our ancestors ate in the land of Egypt. Let all who are hungry come and eat." More than any other holiday, Passover, which begins on the evening of March 26 this year, is surrounded by food traditions and observances. Most of them are related to matzoh.

Matzoh, a cracker-like bread, must be eaten on Passover instead of the usual yeast-raised bread. It recalls that the Jews, fleeing Pharaoh and slavery in ancient Egypt, had no time to let bread rise while preparing for their departure. They quickly mixed flour and water and let it bake in the sun.

Modern methods of preparing matzoh are limited by strict regulations regarding the growing of the wheat and grinding it into flour. Even the water used to mix with this specially prepared flour is guarded against the unwelcome intrusion of any foreign matter that might act as leavening. In a matzoh factory, the entire process must not take more than eighteen minutes, from the initial mixing of flour and water to taking the final product out of the oven. Matzoh is one food not recommended for home preparation.

The requirements that nothing containing leavening be eaten during this eight day observance has strongly influenced the food traditions that surround selecting and preparing foods for the holiday. In addition to not using yeast, homemakers omit baking powder, baking soda, and cream of tartar from the usual list of baking ingredients. Only flour prepared from matzoh itself, called matzoh meal, or a more finely ground version called cake meal, is allowed. Tradition explains that because this flour has been baked already, it isn't in danger of being affected by airborne raising organisms. No other flours are permitted.

These stipulations — using only flour made from matzoh and no leavening agents whatever — limit Jewish homemakers, especially in the area of dessert. As a result, sponge cake is one of the mainstays of Passover desserts. But eight days of eating sponge cake, sponge cake, and more sponge cake is monotonous. Cooking creatively for Passover means searching out recipes that don't depend on raising agents, such as cookies, crisps, and tarts. In addition, the abundance of ingredients in the United States, especially of fresh fruit, has broadened the dessert horizon considerably.

PASSOVER BROWNIES

4 eggs
¾ cup Passover cocoa
2 cups sugar
1 cup cake meal
2 tablespoons potato starch
½ cup strong, cold coffee
½ cup coarsely ground chopped nuts

Oil a 9x13 glass baking pan. Heat oven to 350 degrees.

In a medium mixing bowl, beat the oil and eggs. Add the cocoa and sugar. Mix well. In another bowl, combine the cake meal and potato starch.

Cholent on Pesach? Sure!

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

Not that Pesach isn't difficult enough, what with different dishes, covered counters, exploding tempers and no bagels.

But what on earth do you do for cholent on Shabbat? Especially this year when there are, for all intents and purposes, two Shabbats to think about?

True, the essentials of cholent are potatoes, cooked to a rich, dark brown, meat falling off the bone, maybe even, for the gourmet, a few choice bits of kishka. But what is cholent without beans? Or barley?

For the answer, we can turn to a new cookbook, Come for Cholent ... Again, by Kay Kantor Pomerantz (Bloch Publishing Co., 1994).

This is actually Pomerantz's second cholent cookbook; the first one, Come for Cholent, came out in 1990, and introduced us to such unusual types of cholent as chocolate, vegetarian and Chinese.

The new edition has several interesting twists; Cholent of the month (apple for September, turkey for November, Tex-Mex for July); Guatamalian, made with sausage hot dogs, yam and squash; and even sexy garlic. (Pomerantz explains that garlic to the ancients was considered an aphrodaisiac, and since marital relations are considered a special mitzvah on Shabbat ...)

A nice touch in this edition is a selection of cholents especially for Pesach, where fruits, spices and vegetables almost make you forget what you can't use.

CHOLENT CON VINO

Brown 3 or 4 crushed garlic cloves and 1 medium diced onion in 2 tbsp. oil. Place in crockpot and add all ingredients listed below:

1½ lbs. beef stew meat
2 cut-up tomatoes
5 whole potatoes
6 pearl onions
1 cup sweet wine
2 tbsp. vinegar
2 tbsp. Passover brown sugar (or plain sugar)
½ cup almonds
½ cup raisins
salt and pepper to taste
water

PERUVIAN HENS IN THE POT CHOLENT

Select 2 or 3 cornish hens, depending on size. Dry inside, and rub with mixture of pareve margarine (about 2 tbsp.), garlic (1 or 2, crushed), wine (about 2 tbsp.) and salt and pepper.

Stuffing

1 cup ground beef
1 cup matzah meal
2 eggs
1 cup parsley
1/4 cup grated lemon rind
1/4 tsp. nutmeg
1/4 tsp. (each) salt and pepper

Stuff hens and sew up cavities with needle and thread. Brown in cholent pot in small amount of oil (1/4 cup). When browned, remove hens from pot. Add to pot:

1 layer white potatoes
1 layer parsnips
1 layer onion slices

Return hens to pot and pour sauce over everything:

4 tomatoes, smashed
⅓ cup lemon juice
ginger and paprika
salt and pepper
water, as needed

PASSOVER HAWAIIAN CHOLENT

3 white potatoes, cubed
4 sweet potatoes, cubed
1 can crushed pineapple, with juice
1 onion, diced
1 chicken, cut in eighths
1 cup celery, chopped fine
2 tbsp. Passover brown sugar, or plain sugar salt and pepper
water

Mix all ingredients in crock pot and season.

Come for Cholent ... Again is available at Jewish book stores.

Pure spices, tea are fine for Pesach

Contrary to popular belief, it is not necessary to buy all foodstuffs with a specifically Passover label. For instance:

Most pure spices, such as pepper, basil, rosemary, may be purchased before Passover, with just the regular kashruth certification. This does not apply to spice blends, such as seasoned salt, lemon pepper or Italian seasoning.

This is reflected in the recipes used in both Passover food supplements, which often contain spices not available with Passover certification.

By the way, tea is another product which, if bought before Passover, requires no special Passover hechsher.

Any product bought during Passover, however, must have Passover certification.

Imagination lets vegetarians eat gourmet meals

Vegetarians have an even harder time on Passover than the rest of us, since the staples of their diet, grains and lentils, are not acceptable for Ashkenazi Jews — which is most of us.

The Jewish Vegetarian Society of Toronto has kindly sent us the following recipes. They are vegan, so do not contain eggs or dairy products.

A green salad, matzah and a fruit salad would complete these meals.

SWEET POTATO CASSEROLE
Serves 4-6

A delicious accompaniment which goes particularly well with spicy dishes.

1 lb. 2 oz. sweet potatoes
4 oz. margarine
3 large bananas, sliced
Juice of 2 oranges

Cook the sweet potatoes in their skins in boiling water to cover until just tender. Drain and allow to cool. When cool enough to handle, peel and cut into slices.

Preheat the oven to 350 F. Arrange half of the sweet potato slices in a "margarined" oven-proof dish in a single layer. Dot with a quarter of the margarine, then cover with half of the banana slices. Dot with margarine. Repeat these layers, finishing with a layer of banana slices and the remaining margarine. Pour on the orange juice and bake in the preheated oven for 30 minutes. Serve hot.

SPANISH-STYLE STEWED VEGETABLES
(Menestra de Verdurus)

3 to 4 cloves garlic (optional)
½ lb. yellow onions (about 2 medium sized)
1 lb. small white-skinned potatoes
¼ lb. carrots
1 large green pepper, in chunks
6 tbsp. olive oil
½ lb. mushrooms
1 tsp. salt
2 tbsp. sweet paprika
Fresh-ground black pepper to taste
1 cup vegetable broth
3 cups peeled, chopped tomatoes (with their liquid)
2 bay leaves
Pinch of hot paprika
½ lb. fresh asparagus
½ lb. cooked artichoke hearts
Garnish
Ripe green olives

Peel and thinly slice the garlic. Peel, halve, and thickly slice the onions and the potatoes. Scrape the carrots and cut them in ½-inch lengths.

Heat the olive oil in large, heavy-bottomed pot and saute the garlic and onions in it until the onions are transparent. Add the potatoes, carrots, and green pepper and saute them for 10 minutes, stirring almost constantly.

Wash and trim the mushrooms and add them to the pot along with the salt, sweet paprika, and some fresh-ground pepper. Continue sauteing the vegetables for 5 minutes more, stirring constantly, then add the vegetable broth, tomatoes, bay leaves and a pinch of hot paprika.

Simmer the mixture, uncovered, over low heat for 45 to 50 minutes. Stir it occasionally.

Peel the bottom ends of the asparagus stalks and cut the stalks in 1- to 2-inch pieces. Thickly slice the artichoke bottoms. Add the asparagus and artichoke bottoms to the menestra and simmer it, covered, stirring often, for 10 to 15 minutes more, or just until all the vegetables are tender. The liquid should be greatly reduced by this time.

Serve the menestra hot and garnish each plate with a quartered hard-boiled egg if desired and a few ripe green olives.

Serves 6 to 8.

(Adapted from: The Vegetarian Epicure Book Two).

CASHEW-CARROT LOAF

6 cups chopped carrots
2 cups ground cashews, raw or kosher for Passover
3 tbsp. oil
1 cup finely chopped leeks
1 cup chopped celery
½ cup matzah meal
1 tsp. sea salt
½ tsp. black pepper
2 tsp. crushed sage
½ tsp. thyme
1 tsp. basil

Steam the carrots until tender, then mash them using a fork, potato-masher, blender or food-processor. Six cups of chopped raw carrots make about 3 cups or mashed.

Grind the cashews in a food processor or blender until they are quite fine. Add the oil to the blender, if necessary to help with the grinding.

Mix all the ingredients together and place in an oiled loaf-tin. Bake at 350 F for 35-45 minutes, or until the top edges begin to look dry.

Organic bakery, veggie restaurant part of kibbutz

UJA Press Service

Kibbutz Harduf, a hilltop settlement in the Galilee established in 1982 by the Jewish Agency for Israel, is home to a unique mixture of pioneers, idealists and practical business people.

As part of the kibbutz movement's First Home in the Homeland program, it is also the new home of two immigrant families from the former Soviet Union.

The 30 member families of Kibbutz Harduf enjoy a holistic alternative lifestyle which includes organic food, a cleaner environment, homeopathic medicine and progressive education. "But we have our feet firmly on the ground," insists Guy Lapidot, 32, the settlement's economic manager. "While pursuing what we perceive to be a more wholesome lifestyle, we realize that we have to be a profitable enterprise."

Kibbutz Harduf is certainly a profitable enterprise, with earnings derived from a number of ventures. Among them is Israel's only organic bakery. Using organically grown wheat from the settlement's own fields and flour from its own mill, the bakery supplies bread to health-food shops and subscribers throughout the country.

The kibbutz also operates a vegetarian restaurant and a packaging plant for a range of health foods organically grown in its fields, including soya, barley, cereals and herbs.

Cattle are being raised on organically grown alfalfa and other feeds in Israel's first organic cowshed and dairy, established with the assistance of loans from the Jewish Agency's Department for Rural and Urban Development.

Kibbutz Harduf's alternative approach extends well beyond food production. Its famous homeopathic clinic attracts patients from throughout the country. The settlement's elementary school has an enrolment of more than 120 youngsters from the region. And there are plans to open a residential school for retarded children.

Culture is also an important part of life at Kibbutz Harduf. This Jewish Agency funded settlement maintains an active cultural centre that produces new artistic works in drama, music and dance.

Traditional food, recipes cherished part of seders

By NAOMI ARBIT

Special to The CJN

Tradition is important in the Jewish kitchen, especially at Passover time, the oldest and most cherished of the holidays. At the seder, where family and friends gather, food and wine are used symbolically as the biblical story of the Exodus is retold.

Recipes for foods served at the seder and during Passover may be passed from generation to generation, but there is always room for new dishes that will carry on the tradition.

CHAROSET

4 Granny Smith apples, peeled, seeded and chopped
1/2 cup raisins (opt.)
1/2 cup dates, chopped (opt.)
1 cup chopped walnuts
1-2 tsp. cinnamon, or to taste
2 tbsp. sugar or sugar substitute
1/4 cup Passover wine

Soak raisins and dates in wine several hours. In a food processor, with metal blade process all ingredients until desired consistency.

COUNTRY CHICKEN

1/4 cup parve Passover margarine
2 cloves garlic, minced
4 whole chicken breasts, skinned and halved (or cut-up fryer)
Salt and pepper to taste
1 medium onion, diced
1/2 green pepper chopped
1/2 tsp. thyme
1 16-oz. can whole tomatoes, undrained and chopped
1/2 cup currants
1/2 cup chicken broth or white wine
Toasted slivered almonds

Heat margarine in a large skillet. Brown chicken; remove from skillet to a baking dish.

Saute garlic, onion, and green pepper in drippings until soft. Add tomatoes, thyme, currants and stock. Cook 2-3 minutes. Pour sauce over chicken.

Bake in a 350-degree oven 45 minutes, or until chicken is tender. Garnish with almonds. (4-6 servings)

HOT FRUIT MEDLEY

12 drained macaroons, crumbled
4 large cans fruit; peaches, pears, apricot halves, pineapple slices, pitted cherries, well-drained
1/2 cup slivered almonds
1/4 cup Passover brown sugar, or regular sugar
1/2 cup Passover wine
1/4 cup melted margarine

Cover the bottom of a non-stick, sprayed, 2 1/2 quart casserole with some macaroon crumbs. Alternate layers of fruit and macaroons, ending with macaroons.

Sprinkle with wine, sugar and almonds. Bake in a 350-degree oven for 30 minutes.

Add melted margarine and serve hot. (8 servings)

VEGETABLE KUGEL

1 cup grated apple
1 cup grated sweet potato
1 cup grated carrot
1 cup matzah meal
1/2 cup margarine, melted
2/3 teaspoon salt
1 tsp. cinnamon
1 tsp. nutmeg
1/4 cup sugar; more or less to taste

Cover the bottom of a 10-inch oven dish with non-stick cooking spray. In a mixing bowl combine all ingredients and mix well.

Spoon into the baking dish; cover with foil and bake in a 325-degree oven 45 minutes. Remove foil and bake 15 minutes longer or until as crisp on top as desired.

Slice and serve hot, warm or cool.

ALMOND SPONGE ROLL

6 large eggs, separated; the whites at room temperature
1/2 cup sugar
3/4 cup blanched ground almonds
1/4 tsp. salt
1 tsp. vanilla; or orange or lemon juice, as desired

In a mixing bowl, beat egg whites with salt until stiff but not dry. Set aside.

In another large mixing bowl, beat yolks until light, beat in sugar gradually. Add almonds and flavoring. Fold the egg whites into the yolk mixture.

Pour into a 10 1/2 X 15 1/2 X 12-inch greased baking sheet lined with parchment or oiled foil extending over the ends of the pan. Bake in a 350-degree oven about 15 minutes.

Loosen edges as soon as it comes out of the oven; turn out on a towel dusted with sugar. Remove paper.

Roll hot cake in towel and place on rack to cool.

Cream Filling

2 cups Passover non-dairy whipped topping
3 tbsp. unsweetened Passover cocoa powder
1/4 tsp. cinnamon or flavoring of choice
1 sweet chocolate bar
kosher for Passover whipped topping and strawberries for decorating.

In a mixing bowl, stir whipped topping, cocoa and cinnamon together gently. Shave or shred chocolate bar into the mixture.

Spread filling over the unrolled cake. Beginning with the long side, roll up the cake jelly-roll fashion, using the towel.

Place seam side down onto a serving place. Decorate with whipped topping and whole strawberries. Cake keeps up to 12 hours in the refrigerator. (Do not place berries on cake until serving time.) — JTA

New kosher wines out for Pesach

The Liquor Control Board of Ontario (LCBO) is offering nearly 40 kosher l'Pesach products this year, including eight new wines.

Included in the selection, available at several LCBO outlets across Ontario, are red and white table wines from Israel, France, Italy, California and New York state.

There is also a kosher for Passover Carmel Brut sparkling wine from Israel; an Italian hazelnut liqueur; Amaretto, peach, orange peel and chocolate liqueurs from Israel; and Carmel vodka, a grape brandy and arrack (a licorice flavored spirit), all from Israel.

The Israeli white wines include a Carmel King David Chateau Richon; a Sauvignon Blanc and a Chardonay, both from Golan Galil; a Carmel Hock and a Givon French Colombard.

The reds from Israel include a 1992 Golan Village and a 1990 Golan Galil Cabarnet Sauvignon.

Prices range from $5.95 to $14.40 for wines and $7.95 to $19.65 for spirits.

As well, LCBO Vintages stores and Vintages selections in regular LCBO outlets will be releasing eight new premium kosher l'Pesach wines on March 19. These new releases include table wines from Israel, France and California.

The kosher products are "part of a larger program designed to meet the interests of specific communities and ethnic groups," explains Anne Hartley, director of product management for the LCBO.

Kosher for Passover products can be purchased at LCBO outlets in Hamilton, Kitchener/Waterloo, London, Metro Toronto, Richmond Hill, Unionville, Thornhill, Windsor, Ottawa, Kingston and St. Catharines.

The new table wines will be available at three Metro-area Vintages stores, one in Mississauga and one in Ottawa. They will also be stocked in selected Vintages sections of other stores.

For more information, call the toll-free LCBO Infoline at 1-800-ONT-LCBO. In Metro Toronto, dial (416) 365-5900.

Feminist seder adds new meaning

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

The Passover seder is rich with symbols, among them charoset (representing the mortar used by Israelite slaves in Egypt); matzoh (to remind us that their hasty departure left no time for bread to rise), and salt water (so that we remember their tears).

Recent years have seen the rise of a new trend — a feminist seder in addition to the two traditional seders, bringing new layers of meaning to the ancient symbols.

"Why is this seder...different from all others?" participants were asked at the recent feminist seder co-sponsored by the B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) League for Human Rights, The Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto, and Relation & Encounter, Sisters of Our Lady of Sion, under the umbrella of Women in Interfaith Dialogue. The seder took place at BBC's Hove Street building.

The Haggadah used at the recent event shows how the feminist seder differs from its traditional counterpart. The booklet was compiled from a variety of Jewish/feminist sources and is not meant to replace a traditional Haggadah. In it, within the framework of the traditional seder, readings about women replace readings about the liberation of the Israelites from Egyptian bondage.

Instead of spilling drops of wine for each of the 10 plagues of Egyptian times, participants at the feminist seder spilled wine (grape juice, actually) for each of five plagues related to the oppression of women.

"We recognize the plague of ignorance," begins one reading. "Those who have been beguiled by patriarchal structures and values have ignored and diminished the presence and contribution of their mothers, wives, daughters and sisters. In doing so, they have become only half-learned, their scholarship is only half-finished."

"Why have our mothers on this night been bitter?" goes the second of the four questions in the feminist Haggadah. "Because they did the preparation but not the ritual. They did the serving but not the conducting. They read of their fathers but not of their mothers."

"It's so true," sighed one participant.

The feminist seder is a tribute to Jewish matriarchs and women leaders whose stories have traditionally been relegated to a less prominent position than those of male leaders. The Toronto seder is called The Legacy of Miriam, in honor of Moses' older sister, Miriam the prophetess, who played a key role in the exodus from Egypt.

Other Jewish women heroes recalled during the seder include Hannah Senesh, Glueckel of Hameln, Beruriah, and Deborah the prophetess.

The mix of seder participants, representing Canada's multicultural mosaic, was unusual for a seder. The mix at the head table was symbolic, noted Karen Mock, national director of the League. Rosemary Brown, chief commissioner, Ontario Human Rights Commission; Vivian Harrower, executive director, Women's Interchurch Council of Canada; and Janice Dembo, co-ordinator, Toronto Mayor's Committee on Race Relations were among those at the head table.

Matzoh covers at each table were handmade by Grade 7 students at St. Anthony's School.

"Without intercultural programs like these, we will not make any progress in our battle against hatred and bigotry," said Rochelle Wilner, Ontario regional chair of the League.

Although the seder is a Jewish tradition, the oppression of women is a universal experience, noted seder leader Rabbi Sharon Sobel of Holy Blossom Temple.

Rabbi Sharon Sobel, left, and Camille Nelson of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights lead close to 200 participants in Hebrew singing at the recent feminist seder.

Grossinger's had everything — even on Pesach

By TANIA GROSSINGER
Special to The CJN

I grew up at Grossinger's, the world-famous hotel in New York's Catskill Mountains. Its motto, "Grossinger's has everything," was deemed by those who knew it to be an understatement.

I moved there at the age of 8 from Los Angeles, and still remember the day. I had seen postcards of the resort, but nothing prepared me for that first vision. Everything was, to my small eyes, unexpectedly grand: the large stuccoed main building, with its spacious lobbies and wood-panelled fireplaces; the dining room the size of a football field.

In a two-block radius stood a number of three-storey guest cottages surrounded by lily ponds, flagstone walkways and colorful gardens dotted with small signs that read "Please do not pick us. We bloom for your pleasure. Thank you, the flowers." People in uniforms scurried back and forth doing guests' biddings. The seeming confusion left me breathless.

The hotel, built on 850 acres with accommodations for more than 1,200 guests, had been founded in 1914 by Malke and Selig Grossinger. By the time I arrived, in 1945, it already had earned a worldwide reputation under the ownership of their daughter, Jennie, who was my father's first cousin.

After my father died, my mother Karla and I had moved to Los Angeles. It was Jennie who, thinking I should be with family, offered my mother the job of social director.

Hotel had many repeat guests

In those days, the hotel had many repeat guests. And it was for the Passover holiday that they always reserved places far in advance. Not only were they spared the preparation of the complicated seder meal, they were assured that the religious services would be in accordance with Orthodox law.

Traditionally, Passover is a holiday during which Jewish families come together for two ritualized dinners to celebrate the exodus of the Jews from ancient Egypt. My immediate family was small, yet our seder dinners included a cast of thousands.

My first Passover seder at Grossinger's was the most memorable. I knew next to nothing about the Jewish religion or dietary laws, having attended (I still don't know why) Christian Science Sunday school in Beverley Hills.

I had no idea, for example, that all of the hotel's china, silverware and cooking stoves had to be specially kashered for this particular holiday. Rather than go through the time-consuming ritual with the china, Grossinger's kitchen steward used to purchase a new 2,000-plate set — in the same old pattern, of course. His rationale was breakage during the previous year.

The stoves were made kosher for Pesach with a blowtorch. That first year, the rabbi was so zealous he burned out all the electrical wiring. It was the year there almost was no seder at Grossinger's.

The two seder services were celebrated in the main dining room. An elevated table in the centre seated the cantor, choir, rabbi and male members of the Grossinger family.

I sat alongside the stage at the "family" table. Here gathered Jennie Grossinger, her daughter, assorted aunts, cousins, in-laws and the hotel "children" — youngsters about my age whose parents worked or were related to owners of the hotel.

There must have been 30 of us at the table, all elegantly dressed. Formal attire was de riguer and guests, many of whom were successful in the garment business, vied with each other for the most splendiferous outfits. It was the only evening at the hotel on which women wore their full-length mink coats to dinner.

Each table was set with all the Passover offerings — matzah, bitter herbs, charoset, hard-boiled eggs in salted water — all symbolizing different aspects of the days when Jews were slaves in Egypt. Wine was also central to the celebration.

My mother was up and about most of the time; as the social director, she circulated among the guests to see everything was in order. In her absence, whenever the guests lifted their wine glasses to drink, I followed suit, proud of acting like a grown up.

Toward the end of the evening it came time for everyone to join the choir in singing Passover favorites Dayenu and Chad Gad Yah. I didn't know the words and felt left out. I also felt a little dizzy from the wine. When the songs were over, I stood up to sing one of my own, learned of course at Sunday school. It was surely the first time any of our guests heard Onward Christian Soldiers sung at a seder.

It was at this seder, too, that the tradition of the "holy glass" was born among the children. The Passover service lasted about four hours and none of us children understood Hebrew. Out of boredom, one of the boys dropped some horseradish into his glass of water. The person next to him added some borscht. The third, some mushed-up gefilte fish. And on it went. We passed the glass among ourselves, each person adding something else from the dinner table.

Somebody suggested that the kid who could find nothing new to add to the holy glass had to drink it. The honor turned out to be mine.

Grossinger's was always noted for its entertainment. Danny Kaye, Eddie Cantor, Eddie Fisher, Alan King, Jan Peerce, Jackie Mason and countless other big-name celebrities graced its stage. But during the Passover week, the shows were replaced with lectures, forums, liturgical concerts — in short, nothing exciting to 8 year olds. Left to our own devices — which we almost always were, since our parents worked — we found more interesting pursuits.

That first Grossinger's Passover, I was introduced by my colleagues to the dining room pegboard. People who've been to resort hotels sometimes wonder how the maitre d' determines who is to sit with whom. In those days, he used a pegboard with as many circles as there were tables, with holes in the circle to represent guests. He then placed multicolored pegs — blue for single males, yellow for couples, green for children and pink for single women.

When he received the registration sheet the night before check-in, he filled the board accordingly, seeing that singles sat with singles and women with men whenever possible, then noting it on the chart. When a guest entered the dining room he gave his name, it was checked against the chart and he was shown to his table.

So what did we do before the end-of-the-week check in?

We went to the pegboard when everyone else was at a lecture, took out all the pegs before they were charted and rearranged them our way. The next day, dinner was bedlam.

I spent many other seders at Grossinger's and now, alas, only the memories remain. In 1985, the family sold the property to another hotel operator who planned to renovate it and reopen it under the Grossinger name. It never came to pass. Grossinger's today is nothing more than a few unkempt buildings.

This year, as every year since then, I will sit down to my own Passover seder. I will probably shed a tear, and then I will smile and fill up a "holy glass," honoring the memory of Passover past.

UJA Young Leadership network mission participant Dr. Sharon Perlmutter tries her hand at assembling wheelchairs during a visit to a Yad Sarah workshop last year. Yad Sarah is supported by UJA.

UJA's young leaders set to visit concentration camp

TORONTO — United Jewish Appeal's Young Leadership Network (YLN) will be visiting one of the Nazi era's most gruesome symbols of deceit this summer.

The YLN mission to Czechoslovakia and Israel will be touring Theresienstadt, used as a propaganda ghetto to fool the world about how Jews were being treated.

In July, 1943, the Nazis allowed the International Red Cross to inspect Theresienstadt. Before Red Cross officials set foot in the ghetto, the Nazis had deported a large number of residents to Auschwitz to decrease congestion. They erected phony stores, schools, a bank and flower gardens. They produced a film demonstrating, according to the Encyclopedia of the Holocaust, "how the Jews were leading a new life under the benevolent protection of the Third Reich." After the movie was shot, those who appeared in it were shipped to the gas chambers.

Mission participants will learn the real story of Theresienstadt during a pre-trip seminar led by an expert on the subject. Of 140,000 Jews sent to Theresienstadt, only 19,000 survived.

According to mission co-chair Joni Rosenthal, the Theresienstadt trip and a visit to other Czechoslovakian Jewish sites will be quite an eye opener.

"The majority of participants going on the trip have never been to a ghetto or a concentration camp," she said.

In fact, most of those on previous tours were first-time mission members. Rosenthal expects the same situation this year.

In Israel, UJA's young leaders will be visiting projects built and supported with the help of donor dollars. One of them is Metullah's Canada Centre recreation complex on the Lebanese border, where Israel's Olympic figure skater Misha Shmerkin spent time training for the games.

But Rosenthal believes the biggest benefit of a mission is building lasting friendships.

"People I never knew before I went are now my closest friends."

The YLN mission, Linking Our Legacy, leaves Toronto for Prague July 14 and returns from Israel July 26.

A planning meeting is scheduled for March 16 at 7:30 p.m. Those interested should contact Lydia English at 635-2882, ext. 172.

Cardin challenges women to reach for top

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Shoshana Cardin, longtime high-profile Jewish community leader in the United States, challenged local women leaders to set even higher standards for themselves in a recent keynote speech.

The chair of the National Jewish Centre for Learning and Leadership (CLAL) and national vice-chair of United Jewish Appeal (UJA) spoke at the joint installation of the 1995 boards of Jewish Women's Federation (JWF), and UJA Women's Campaign held at the Lipa Green Building.

Noting the diminishing number of Jews who are "passionately involved," Cardin urged her audience to "start using the word passion. A passionless act is forgotten both by the activist and the recipient."

"Values" is another word Cardin would like to hear more often. "We have to have the courage to express expectations," she said.

"We are responsible for the future. We are the matriarchs of the 21st century and we are fashioning that 21st century right now.

"In the past, for some time, form was more important than substance," Cardin said. "[Leaders were] chosen because they spoke well, because they dressed well, because they came from the right families or homes, or because their gifts were magnanimous.

"What has changed in the Jewish community around the world is that today substance is more important than form. We understand that we must be Jewishly educated. We no longer ask [whether programming should] have a Jewish component. There must be a Jewish component in everything we do. As leaders we must recognize that component and express it."

Shoshana Cardin

Do we have the courage, she asked, to require leaders to be Jewishly educated in addition to having leadership skills? "I throw that challenge out for both men and women, and in some places it's rejected immediately."

Cardin also spoke of extending the idea of family to include the larger Jewish community. "We are charged to be activists, to speak out when there are needs to be adressed...needs of the Jewish community here, in Israel and in lands where there is still strife and anti-Semitism. That's our responsibility," she said.

Cardin expressed her support for the peace process in Israel and reminded her audience that "we have a role to play — to support that which will probably create a different Israel."

Alluding to the Hebron massacre, Cardin stated, "All human beings, not just Jews, have the right to be protected and if you and I don't express that, then we don't have the right to ask for it."

Reminding her audience of the skills and responsibility that come with leadership, Cardin cautioned, "Don't be afraid of the words 'authority' and 'power.' We must use [power] discreetly, invisibly, wisely — but we must use it."

The most important responsibility for leaders, said Cardin, touching on the theme of continuity that underlay her talk, is to develop the next generation of leadership. "A Jewish leader who does not leave a successful, Jewishly educated, Jewishly committed, passionate leader [to succeed her] has failed," she said.

Hundreds join singles registry — 'The best way to meet people'

By now, you've realized there's an infinitesimal chance of finding your significant other squeezing produce at the supermarket, sweating on the Stairmaster, or folding bikini briefs in the laundry room. Spending an evening in a state of prolonged mental cruelty on yet another lousy blind date seems unbearable. Worst of all, you're tired of hearing your mother kvetch that you're not getting any younger.

Maybe it's time for something a little different. Something non-threatening. And fun. Like the Jewish Singles Registry. Unlike those promise-you-everything-deliver-next-to-nothing expensive matchmaking services, the Registry is a community-based organization that allows members to select for themselves the persons they wish to meet. No astrology. No psychic intuition. Mo mistakes. Because you do the choosing.

Memberships skyrocket

"It's positively the best way to meet people," says David, a registry member. "Where else can you read, learn about, and actually see what the other person looks like, before any introduction is made!"

"I don't like other people choosing who I go out with," says Debbie, another member. "Here I am in complete control, and I decide for myself who I want to date."

Membership in the registry has skyrocketed over the past year, and the future looks even brighter.

"Our membership is way ahead of last year's," says Rob Singer, the registry's director. "We're getting a lot of referrals from existing members who tell their friends, and these friends bring in additional friends."

Judy, who has been a member now for six weeks, says it best. "Within four days of joining I was already dating . . . amazing! No more Saturday nights alone for me!!"

Whether you are just looking to expand your current group of friends, get involved in a serious relationship, or ready to get married, the Jewish Singles Registry is an introduction service like no other. It's honest, straightforward, and very affordable. With no unwelcome surprises. Best of all, because you do the choosing — no date is a blind date.

For more information about the Jewish Singles Registry please call Rob at 398-7068.

How on earth can a healthy shoe look this good?

Yes, it's true – you can step proudly into spring knowing your feet look great without having to pay the price. (Neither in pain nor in dollars!) No sore feet to soak, no devastated bank account to replenish. Just slip on a pair of Naots and "let your feet do the walking".

With typical Israeli ingenuity, the Naot designers have found a way to pack a whole lot of colour and style into an extremely compelling package. With 30 styles and an average of five colours per style, you could walk clear across Israel and back and show the desert floor a new look every few hours or so! (If you're just sauntering down to the corner for a few bagels, however, one or two pairs will do admirably!).

Available in purple, plum, forest green, and rust, the sandals which made the line famous have broken a traditional black-brown monopoly. It's cool to be a "Naotter".

Doctors, nurses love Naots

Solid construction is another factor in the line's favour. Ten years ago, "Made in Israel" was a novelty. Today, it's a symbol of quality that flags down anyone looking for a rugged, well-made product. Worn by health professionals like doctors and nurses, the Naot line offers the kind of comfort previously available only in monstrous boxy "health" shoes that looked like a 1950's Buick. That nightmarish image can be put to rest: Naots are footwear "Corvettes," and once you walk them out of the showroom you'll be addicted to their comfort and good looks. It's almost too good to be true, but one "test walk" will convince you.

Dressy styles

Well-established as a casual favourite of men and ladies of all ages, Naots now come in a broader cross-section of dressy/casual styles perfect for everyday office and evening wear. Of course, sandals and clogs are still the mainstay of the line, and the cushioning latex layer that adds comfort to the sandal's traditional cork base have allowed Naot to "leapfrog" their big-name competitors. (A $20-lower price tag doesn't hurt either!)

Co-owners Sandy Galet and Corinne Lissoos are excited about a "beautiful new collection of wooden clogs" with a moulded insole that will offer you even more walking possibilities.

Naots are available in better shoe stores across Ontario, including Step 22 in Waterloo and No Mean Feet and Miller Shoes in Hamilton. If you're from Toronto and don't want to walk clear across Ontario (let alone Israel!), you can pick up a pair at Prairie Dog, Get Outside, Capezio, Brown's, Marquis Shoes, and other fine stores.

Health, comfort, fashion, and style in one shoe. How on earth? Try them and find out. And don't be surprised if you start walking on air!

Three companies, one commitment to glatt kosher excellence

It's cute, it's colourful, and it continues to draw crowds. The dazzling art deco dining room of the recently-opened Wok 'N Deli glatt kosher restaurant at Clark and Hilda, complete with neon-ringed ceiling, is a visual delight. Since you don't go there to look, but to dine, it's nice to know that the menu, which runs the gamut of tasy deli and chinese dishes (with a few italian and continential specialties thrown in for good measure), offers so many interesting choices you may linger over the "forspeis" forever!

Two months after opening, the restaurant continues to have lineups nightly. Partner Malcolm Manricks emphasizes, however, that the wait is never too long. And what better time to catch up with the neighbours?!

One of the reasons for the restaurant's success is price. Overall, the prices compare favourably with those of any restaurant, let alone kosher. This, coupled with a fabulous $2.99 kids' meal which is available daily with no strings attached, allows an entire family to eat out without breaking the bank. It also encourages people who don't necessarily keep kosher to try the experience.

In another neck of the woods, Manricks and his partners Rabbi A.J. Eisenberger, Joe Elmaleh, and Mendy Goldman have pulled off a major coup by opening Canada' first in-hotel glatt kosher restaurant.

King Solomon's Table, located in the Montecassino Place Hotel at Chesswood and Sheppard, opened February 28 to rave reviews. Diners are greeted by a large, immaculately appointed room giving directly onto Sheppard, with ample natural light yet tastefully screend from the outside world.

A fitting setting for both family dining and business luncheons, "The Table", as it's already affectionately known, offers a menu that features an eclectic variety of dishes from Italy, the Orient, and other locales. Delightful offerings such as Veal Chauseur and BBQ Back Ribs beckon from the West, while Honey Chili Chicken and Spicy Szechuan Orange Beef are sure to stir your Eastern fancies. If your children are fast-growing (who's aren't?!), perhaps you'll need to bring them to the Wok 'N Deli for lunch and "The Table" for dinner as their appetities escalate!

On the catering side, Regal Kosher Caterers (same ownership) continues to do a brisk business in bar/bat mitzvah parties, wedding parties, and other special occasions. With a permanenet kosher kitchen inside the Montecassino, Regal has forged a solid reputation in the community for its elegantly-catered affairs. Its ongoing relationship with the hotel also allows it to arrange favourable room rates and other perks for your out-of-town guests.

"Little" Marquis Shoes big on comfort, style

The "little shoe store that could" is bustling with spring activity, even as the last lingering snowdrifts melt into oblivion.

Well-known for its wide range of sizes and a comfort fit that'll make your feet feel as good as they look, Marquis Shoes boasts some exciting new offerings for spring.

Earth tones continue to be popular, while navy, strong at other times, has emerged as a spring colour too. Choked-up top lines are still in vogue, which is good news for your long skirts.

Wovens and natural corks abound, and the store's casual collections include several selections from the ever-popular Naot line from Israel.

If you like to walk on the wild side, Marquis has "Looney Tunes" shoes from Keds that'll keep your feet happy and well-read. Accessorize with the shop's large collection of straw hats and matching bags, and you're ready for the beach!

But don't leave the boardroom just yet - the shop's usual strong mainstream-to-dressy collections will let you put your foot down in style when the occasion arises.

Classic, up-to-date looks from Rangoni, Sesto Meucci, Stuart Weitzman, Nickels, Unisa, Van Eli, Fontanelli, and La Vallée are all featured in a variety of styles and colours in finishes ranging from plain to metallic. As always, says owner Howard Share, "every shoe in the store was bought with comfort in mind."

Marquis has gained a loyal following of women who want their feet to look great without sacrificing a comfortable fit. Many of Share's clients are referred by podiatrists. With a wide range of sizes (8 1/2–10AAA, 6 1/2–11AA, 4–11B, and 6–10C), chances are he has just the shoe for you. And prices are down-to-earth: the "rush" from buying the great pair of shoes you really want can be had surprisingly guilt-free.

Back on the boardwalk, you'll love the new "Easy Spirit" sports shoe and a brand new casual shoe from La Vallée. Marquis also has a plentiful selection of the newly-popular espadrilles.

Good fit, flair, and forgiving prices: the "little store that could" did, and will do for you too. Just drop in and see how easy it is to walk out with a smile on your feet.

Hadassah — WIZO develops future leaders

Developing new leaders is the road to a secure future for any organization, an official of Toronto Hadassah-WIZO says.

Leadership chair Judith Bloom says Hadassah-WIZO has attracted many new members, resulting in a substantial growth in the organization.

"We feel we have to meet their needs as well as our existing members who have not seen themselves in a leadership role. They are our future leaders, so we want to instill in them the desire to lead and give them the confidence and necessary skills to do so."

To that end, Bloom's committee is holding a Leadership Day on Sunday, April 17. Strategies For Success will offer participants the chance to explore leadership ideas with experts in Human Resources Management. Workshops will be facilitated by Prof. Selma Sage of York University and Davis Associates' Anita Gertin and Taube Zeifman.

"It's a full day that will be extensive and intensive, offering opportunities to develop leadership skills which will take us into the next century."

Marla Dan is a member of the leadership committee. A member of Hadassah-WIZO for six years, Dan has served in executive roles for Tamid Chapter but this is her first time serving on a committee at the Toronto executive level.

She attributes her success in these roles to leadership forums for chapter executives.

"We learned how to confidently organize and preside over meetings. Effective leaders need to be able to listen and be objective.

"It's crucial that leadership development be available to women in our chapters. They need to be given the confidence and skills to get involved as productive leaders."

Bloom says it's Toronto Hadassah-WIZO's obligation to groom leaders who will ensure the future and well-being of the organization.

Leadership development is "an added value we give our members. It is really exciting to see the emergence of dedicated and effective leaders."

To register, call the Toronto Hadassah-WIZO office at (416) 789-4373.

Cajinet links community on the information highway

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — York University psychologist Laurence Miller has communicated extensively with Israeli Jews in recent weeks, learning firsthand about their attitudes towards their Palestinian neighbours at this tense juncture in the peace process.

Because he utilizes the electronic mail service known as Internet, Miller participates in these discussions at a fraction of the cost of long-distance telephone calls.

Miller, whose professional specialty is learning disabilities, raves about the so-called information highway and its potential for interglobal personal communication.

"Internet makes geography irrelevant," he said. "You can access a computer in Israel or in Timbuktu almost as easily as accessing a computer in Peterborough. It can give you personal relationships with people on the other side of the world."

Recently, Miller and Rob Brickman, a Thornhill accountant, set up a Canadian Jewish information network called Cajinet. Their aim was to help disseminate information of interest to the Canadian Jewish community and to various communal agencies that might benefit from an Internet link.

Free for users, Cajinet is operated by Cajin, which Miller describes as "an embryonic community service agency."

Discussion group just for rabbis

Cajinet joins a growing number of discussion groups, or conferences, of interest to Jewish users. These include special interests like Torah, Jewish genealogy and making aliyah.

According to Miller, there is a discussion group specifically for rabbis and a service called Israeline, which provides news about Israel. Jerusalem One, a computer node operated by the government of Israel, provides a range of informational services.

"It's very active in promoting information sharing between Israel and the Diaspora," said Miller, Jerusalem One's Toronto representative. (Electronic address is: Jerusalem One.datasrv.co.il.)

To gain access to the information highway, potential users require a computer, modem and telephone line. They also need an electronic address, which is usually acquired through a subscription to an on-line service like Compuserve, CRS Online, Delphi or America Online. The cost is roughly the same as for a basic telephone line.

"It's a major technological innovation," Miller said. "Like the invention of television, it opens up whole new areas of information that people never had access to before. Like television, it changes your whole perception of reality. It gives you access to people and information that you never would have had access to before."

So far, Cajinet has attracted about 30 members. To join, send this e-mail message — subscribe cajinet [your name] — to this electronic address: listserv-at-nysernet.org. In response, you should receive a message outlining the features of Cajinet and the various commands it uses.

"Cajinet discussions can be about social or political issues, organizational matters, community events, anything of interest to Jewish people in Canada," said Miller. "Say someone is concerned about an incident of anti-Semitism in Moncton, N.B. He or she would post that on the list. It's a way of keeping people informed about things you'd like them to know about."

Saltzman lands plum role

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Not many Canadian Jewish actors have a father born in Harlem, N.Y., but that's why 37-year-old musical comedy star Avery Saltzman can play both sides of the border.

Saltzman, son of Pearl and George Saltzman of Thornhill, now has his feet planted squarely in Canada, performing in the Canadian megamusical Napoleon at the Elgin Theatre. It's now in previews and is opening March 23.

"My father was born in Harlem in 1920 when it was a far different place than it is now and where many Jewish immigrants lived," Saltzman said.

The light baritone singer plays several roles in Napoleon: the "mean-spirited and vindictive" French consul Barras and lighter characters with comedy duets.

"We need this kind of musical in Canada where we can create characters from scratch, not just be slotted into roles as part of regional productions," he said.

Seven weeks of intense rehearsal led up to previews of Napoleon. All the performers in this Canadian-written play are Canadian, except for the two leads. It has cost $4.5 million to stage, has a 32-member cast, a 26-piece orchestra and an $80 top ticket price. Marlene Smith and Ernie Rubenstein are the producers.

Though he is excited about appearing in Napoleon, Saltzman bemoans the shrinking market for smaller theatres hit by the success of the megamusicals like Andrew Lloyd Weber's Cats.

"The small theatres are badly needed, that's what theatre is all about."

In addition to his parents, Saltzman has two brothers, Mark and Laurin, living in Thornhill.

Among his favorite Toronto appearances were performances in Kismet and Damn Yankees at the Royal Alex, in Rumors with Elliott Gould and as Pozzo in Waiting for Godot.

Books

By BERNARD BASKIN

Unto The Soul by Aharon Appelfeld (Random House $27.50)

In an interview some years ago, Aharon Appelfeld stated that the Jewish experience in the 20th Century, in all its manifestations is probably the "deepest" experience that human beings have ever had. He went on to say, "The range of this experience — religious, secular, socialist, anarchic, liberal, nationalist — is a wonderful thing. It is what makes me so happy to be a Jew."

Appelfeld is widely recognized as the most successful writer in Hebrew attempting to portray the plight of Jews during the Holocaust.

As a child he was forced to fend for himself when the Nazis occupied his native Romania in 1941. When his parents were killed by the Germans, he was placed in a camp and would have shared their fate if he had not managed to escape, living in the woods on what locals and peasants gave him. With the arrival of the Red Army he managed to get to Italy and later to Palestine.

He was only 16 when he shared in the Israeli War of Independence. Later he saw service in the Sinai campaign and in the Six Day and Yom Kippur Wars.

A prolific writer (twelve novels, five collections of short stories and a volume of essays) Appelfeld rarely describes life in the ghettos or death camps. His artistic method is to focus on what happened before the outbreak of war or in the aftermath of the liberation of the camps. His technique is one of obliquity or indirection. It has been called "eloquence through reticence."

Thus, in Badenheim 1939 (1974), perhaps his best known novel, he presents the false sense of security on the part of a self-deluded group of Jews just before the outbreak of war. Set in a central European resort town with all its traditional entertainments for visitors, the story moves slowly but inexorably from a general, vague feeling of malaise to bizarre reactions on the part of the Jewish vacationers to their eventual orderly deportation in boxcars. There is little rage shown by the bewildered victims — only frustration, bafflement and incredulity.

As a writer, sensitive to the full range of Jewish feeling and belief, Appelfeld asserts that he identifies with his parents who were assimilated Jews, but also with his grandparents who were devout believers. "The presence of both sets in me is strong."

Unto the Soul is a strange and ultimately disappointing novella. Gad and Amalia, adult brother and sister, are importuned by their dying uncle to become caretakers of a cemetery of Jewish martyrs, high on a Rutherian mountain. Turn of the century Eastern Europe is evoked only sketchily as the siblings begin to suffer from physical isolation and lack of human contact.

With increasing despair they resort to alcoholism and incest. Racked with pain and guilt over their sins, and Gad's inability to pray, the couple's arid and thankless lives are depicted in stark contrast to their sacred responsibility to maintain the cemetery. In the end typhus from the valley below afflicts Amalia and the bleak and spare story ends in ambivalence and indecision as the couple leave their mountain home to find hospital treatment for the sick Amalia.

Is this book meant as an allegory of Jewish suffering and isolation? Does the mountain graveyard somehow symbolize the martyred men and women of the State of Israel? Are the sins of the depressed couple symbolic of the shortcomings of modern society?

Some readers will interpret this powerful and haunting work in a variety of ways and find meaning in an uncertain message. Others, however, will regard it as oblique, unpleasant and depressing.

Children's Haggadah makes seder meaningful

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — No matter how much one likes to talk about the importance of tradition at Passover, the fact remains that for children, the regular Haggadah tends to be long, and frequently tedious. It is to the credit of the Reform and humanist elements of Judaism that they have published Haggadahs that will make the seder more meaningful and enjoyable.

Bubby and Zaydy's Happy Haggadah; an ethical-humanist seder, by Cantor Jason Norman Bauch (Punim Press, 1993) emphasizes the universality of Jewish teachings, such as a concern for the poor, the homeless, and the oppressed, a recognition of the dangers of pollution, the uniqueness of the individual.

Deliberately short, as the introduction explains, the order of the seder is changed, so that, for instance, the four questions and the popular Dayenu come after the meal.

Seder songs are translated somewhat freely; Echad Me Yodeiah, (Who knows one?) comes out: One means unity/Everyone is free...In all the world/Let no one be in slavery.

There is even a selection of "Bubby's Famous Passover recipes," including charoset, tzimmes, and matzah balls.

A Children's Haggadah (text by Howard Bogot and Robert Orkand, published by the Central Conference of American Rabbis, 1994) while also shortened, follows the order of the traditional seder. It is filled with delightful illustrations and sketches, by Devis Grebu, musical notes for songs, and clear explanations of the different rituals. The language is simple, but never condescending.

Especially effective is an introduction, which discusses the different meanings of freedom.

Gloria Teles Pushker's Toby Belfer's Seder; a Passover story retold (Pelican Publishing Co., 1994) is not a Haggadah; rather, it is a delightful story of a little girl who lives in a small southern town, and shares her seder with her best friend, a Christian girl. The family atmosphere is very strong here, with the grandparents coming to spend Pesach, and everyone pitching in to help prepare.

The reader learns about the rituals of the seder along with the girlfriend, in a moving and interesting way.

Illustrations, by Judith Hierstein, are beautiful, with emphasis on bright purples, greens and pinks.

I would wish the author had not included Toby tricking her friend by convincing her she had to wear a sheet to the seder. Although it is done in the context of friendship, it adds a jarring note totally at odds with the rest of the book.

Similarly, Toby's explanation of the concluding line of the seder "next year in Jerusalem" as being "just our way of wishing each other freedom and peace" is unworthy of the seder experience.

What is interesting is a brief discussion of the parallels between Passover and Easter.

Jerome a delight in Stage West production

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It takes a menacing hulk of a man to be the star of the comedy Breaking Legs, and Jewish actor Howard Jerome fills the bill to a T. In fact, the role of a Mafia gangster, suffering constantly from heartburn, who can laugh without opening his lips, seems made to order for him.

The story of Breaking Legs is straightforward: The local Mafia, for reasons unkown, is bankrolling a new play by a New England professor of literature. The professor wants out of the deal after Jerome and his pals rub out a crony who welched on a debt. But the daughter of one of Jerome's colleagues, an ex-student of the professor, steps in to rescue the deal — and the professor.

Running at Stage West dinner theatre in Mississauga until May 1, Breaking Legs, written by Tom Dulack, and directed by Richard Kline, is well served by all its cast, but Jerome, with his bulk and menacing airs, gives the play the tension and comedy it needs.

A lot of the fun comes fom the wide cultural gap between the professor, played well by Peter James Haworth, and the Mafia members. Another Jewish actor, Sam Malkin, as the man who can't pay his race track debts, neatly conveys the nervousness and hanging-on-to-life quality needed.

Jerome, describes himself as an actor, singer, writer, teacher, director, producer, activist, futurist and humorist. This may or not be true, but one thing is certain — he can laugh without opening his lips. It's much more menacing that way.

Kop-Hacker in Mikado raises support, money for Yiddish

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Those British scions of the Victorian era, Gilbert and Sullivan, have left us an unusual legacy.

Three sold-out performances of a Yiddish version of their famous operetta The Mikado have ensured continuation of Yiddish studies at the University of Toronto through 1994-95. A net of $10,000 was raised.

On its 10th anniversary, event sponsor Friends of Yiddish was able to show that Yiddish lives in Toronto. Almost 2,000 people crowded the halls of Harbord Collegiate to see Der Yiddisher Mikado over the March 5 weekend.

It was fitting that the star of the show, Murray Nesbitt as the mischievous Kop-Hacker/Lord High Executioner, (Khay-Shpay, or Big Shot), is a native Torontonian. Now a New York law professor, Nesbitt's sisters attended Harbord Collegiate, where annual G. & S operettas (in English) became a legend.

The high point of the production by the visiting Gilbert and Sullivan Light Orchestra Company of Long Island came when Khay-Shpay entreated the audience to join him in wooing Khane Pesl, his second choice for a bride, by singing Oy Vez Mir (Woe is Me) to the famous Tit-Willow music.

For Eda Zimler Schiff, president of Friends of Yiddish, and Bayla Chaikof, chair of the committee for Yiddish at U of T, the weekend confirmed that Yiddish can capture the nuances of G & S librettos while giving them a twist of skepticism. Both thanked the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto for supporting Yiddish causes.

Among Harbordites introduced at the opening performance were Frank Shuster, who played Ko-Ko, the Lord High Executioner in 1933, and Bernie Berger, former director of the Jewish Vocational Service, who was the Major General in Pirates of Penzance.

Der Yiddisher Mikado doesn't approach the quality of choreography and voice of The Mikado staged at the Stratford Festival, but that isn't the intention. It did best when the Yiddish, in dialogue and song, was enunciated clearly enough so that the misdoings of bureaucrats were understood. Khay-Shpay walked away with the honors in this category. He moved with grace and elan, and he could be heard. It would have helped the audience to have transliterated versions of the Yiddish adaptation of the famous songs.

Also a sharper, political bite to the adapations would be welcomed. This was evident in the audience's lively reaction to the Lord High Executioner putting on his hit list, "all those who say some of their best friends are Jews."

The show's musical director, Al Barouch, played Yanki-Pu (Nanki-Poo in English), the disgusied wandering minstrel looking for Yum-Yum. He had the most outstanding voice in the cast. Marty Fuller as Der Mikado and Arlene Kane, Roberta Scholl and Evelyn Rob as the Three Little Maids were strong performers.

Sally Buckstone did an energetic job as director from a seat in front of the cast.

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

How many deluxe North American hotels provide glatt kosher room service at the drop of a yarmulke? New York's posh Hotel Pierre does. Prime rib of beef, veal with rosemary, grilled breast of chicken and poached salmon are just some of the kosher entrees available on a moment's notice at this city landmark on Fifth Avenue at 61st Street, overlooking the southeast corner of Central Park.

The Pierre's award-winning chef de cuisine is 27-year-old Joel Somerstein, whose family has been in the kosher catering business for three generations. His parents operate The Water's Edge, a kosher restaurant in Queens with a stunning view of Manhattan.

The Pierre is a distinctive building with arched windows and an extended mansard roof conveying a European sensibility. Situated in one of the most exclusive neighbourhoods of Manhattan, the hotel opened in 1929, at the tail end of an era in which New York society matrons and patrons still cherished their links with Europe. Today one still occasionally hears guest speaking French, German or Italian in the elevators — run by friendly operators who don't hesitate to advise you to wear a scarf if it's cold outside.

The Pierre offers an intimate cafe, impeccable service, prime park views and 203 guest rooms and suites decorated in a style of refined opulence. Last year the magazine Conde Nast Traveler ranked the hotel 16th on its list of top 25 American hotels. The price for the Pierre's brand of exclusivity is as steep as its skyscraping tower: double rooms start at $310 per night.

"People may have seen staying at the Pierre as needless luxury," says public relations manager Mary Jo McNally. "We see that people are willing to spend top dollar as long as they get value for their money."

That value includes complimentary overnight shoe shines, 24-hour dry cleaning, and other services meant to give business travelers the edge. Popular for weddings and other functions within New York's Jewish community, the hotel is also strong on family leisure travel, and even offers amenities for pets.

The Pierre is part of the world-renowned Four Seasons chain, which is headquartered in Toronto under president Isadore Sharp. As Four Seasons recently acquired the Regent chain of hotels, Sharp has been doing an inordinate amount of globe-trotting lately. With any luck, however, we might catch him in Toronto soon after Pesach.

Tours of Italy

Italian Jewish Heritage: Victours, a Toronto-based group travel company that focuses on Italy, is offering a new 14-day Jewish heritage tour of Italy, with 1994 departures dates set for April 17, May 15, Oct. 9 and Nov. 6.

Sights include the ruins of the oldest synagogue in Europe at Ostia Antica, the Ardeatine Caves, Isola Tiberina and the Jewish Ghetto, the Great Synagogue of Florence, the Milan synagogue, and the medieval ghetto of Venice. The Vatican and other non-Jewish sites are also included, as are 13 nights' accommodation in four-star hotels, most meals, tour escort throughout, and all entrance fees where applicable.

Air travel is via Air France, land travel via deluxe motorcoach. The cost is $4,595 per person, based on double occupancy. The program was designed by Victours' public relations manager Max Benaim in conjunction with Mary Vecchiarino, Victours' Italian-born president.

"What impresses me the most on this itinerary is the Jewish ghetto in Venice," says Vecchiarino. "The place is breathtaking. You feel that you are in a 100 per cent Jewish country. The community has been there for centuries — yes, it's still there — and it occupies a full city block. The synagogue, the people wearing the old costumes, everything conveys the old ambience, right in the heart of Venice."

There are old synagogues and traces of Jewish history all over Italy. Rome, which boasts the earliest Jewish foothold in Europe (dating from 139 BCE), was the capital of the corrupt empire that destroyed the Jerusalem Temple. Bitter was the lot of the Jewish slaves who in 70 CE were forced to erect the Arch of Titus in Rome to celebrate the Temple's destruction.

In the Venice ghetto nearly 200 years ago (1797), Jews danced joyously as vanguards of Napoleon's armies broke down the heavy ghetto doors which had been locked nightly since medieval times. And 50 years ago next week — on March 24, 1944 — the German SS brutally shot to death 335 Jewish men and boys at the Ardeatine Caves, which are catacombs along the Appian Way.

These are among the momentous sites of Jewish significance on the Victours itinerary. For further information, phone (416) 630-0153 or toll-free 1-800-668-7475.

Killer whale born at Orlando park

ORLANDO, Florida — On December 31, Sea World of Florida rang in a whale of a new year with the arrival of Baby Namu, the second killer whale birth in just three months at the Orlando marine life park.

Gudrun, a 17-year-old killer whale gave birth to the calf in Sea World's multimillion-litre research and breeding facility, Shamu Stadium.

As a result of the two births coming so closely together, researchers and marine mammal experts are afforded an extraordinary opportunity to study the social interaction, communication, behavior and development of two young killer whale calves. The information, which will be shared with independent researchers and the public, will help to further understanding and knowledge of killer whales.

According to Dr. Ann Bowles, senior research biologist at San Diego's Hubbs Research Institute, communication among young killer whales is one of the many unexplored areas of marine mammal science. "Nobody has figured out how to make recordings of mother and calf killer whales from the wild, so Sea World is the only place we could address such questions. We'd also like to understand whether there are gender differences in learning, and what this means in social interactions later on," Dr. Bowles said.

Gudrun gave birth to the 136-kilogram, two-metre-long calf in Shamu Stadium following a 90-minute labor. Moments after the birth, the newborn calf instinctively swam to the surface for its first breath of air.

"With each successful birth at the Sea World parks, we are adding to the knowledge about killer whales," said Brad Andrews, vice president/zoological operations for the Sea World parks."

"Gudrun and her calf appear to be doing well," Andrews said. "As always, the first few weeks in a calf's life, are critical." First-year mortality rates of killer whales in the wild are estimated to run as high as 50 per cent.

Four little rockhopper penguins steal the hearts of anyone who sees them — includng Sea World of Florida bird specialist Janet Adams. These chicks are being raised by Sea World's aviculture staff.

"As we always do in this situation, we'll observe Gudrun and the new calf around the clock. We'll be looking for normal bonding and nursing," said Andrews. "Good nursing is critical to the calf's survival, but we'll also watch for an indication that its digestive system is healthy."

The calf will nurse for about a year before slowly graduating to a solid diet of fish. In the next 12 months, its weight will nearly triple.

The birth was Gudrun's second. In 1989, the more than five-metre-long, 2,100-kilogram whale gave birth to a female killer whale.

In addition to the most recent calf, eight other killer whales have been born and successfully raised at Sea World parks in San Diego, California, San Antonio, Texas and Orlando.

The births, part of the most successful killer whale breeding program in the world, have allowed scientists to study the animals' growth rates, reproductive biology, development, blood parameters, acoustics, cognitive skills and communications. The program has also provided a unique opportunity for Sea World guests to see, enjoy and learn about killer whales.

Sea World of Florida is an Anheuser-Busch Theme Park. Other Anheuser-Busch Theme Parks include Busch Gardens parks in Tampa and Williamsburg, Va.; Water Country USA in Williamsburg; Sesame Place in Langhorne, Pa., near Philadelphia; Adventure Island in Tampa; the Sea World parks in San Diego, Calif., San Antonio, Texas, and Aurora, Ohio; and Cypress Gardens near Winter Haven, Fla.

Tour of Petra reveals wonders of ancient world

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

We left Aqaba at dawn, its squat buildings and palm trees receding into the desert behind the jeep's clouds of dust.

Travelling the King's Highway, we reached Petra in two hours, and took breakfast at the Forum, one of only a few good local hotels. Then, seeing horses for hire, we chose two fine beasts — Ruba a noble white steed, myself a sturdy roan — and penetrated the mouth of the serpentine canyon, the Siq, that winds into the rose-red ancient city of Petra.

A trained guide, Ruba had been here many times. Still, Ruba seemed as awed as me, entering Petra for the first time. We rode in silence as the Siq became steeper and narrower around us.

There was a kind of sultry holiness in the air that neither of us could disturb. We encountered few other visitors. For almost three-quarters of an hour, the grating of the horses' hooves on rock was practically the only sound we heard.

We rounded a bend and confronted an astonishing sight: the majestic facade of the Treasury, a large and architecturally splendid building carved into solid rock. At this point the Siq opens into a broad plaza, beyond which lies a city of 10,000 rock-hewn dwellings. The builders were the Nabateans, a reclusive Biblical-era tribe, and the Romans who conquered them.

What made the site so desirable to both the Nabateans and the Romans was its seclusion. Strange and vast, this unique metropolis is ringed by mostly impenetrable mountains. Lost to Western travellers since the Crusades, rediscovered by a Swiss explorer in 1812, Petra is considered one of the wonders of the ancient world.

The city, Ruba explained, has become accessible to sightseers only in the last few decades. Before then, Bedouins camping in the stone dwellings would greet travellers with rifle-fire. Even today, the city receives relatively few outsiders. There is no vehicular access, so you arrive on horse, camel or foot. The site was featured briefly in Steven Spielberg's Indiana Jones and the Last Crusade; one imagines an army of film people arriving in helicopters.

Beside the Treasury, several Bedouins park their camels, hoping to rent them out for photographs or guided tours. The Bedouins are not indigenous, Ruba informed me, since no one lives in Petra anymore. Several years ago, the government declared the site a national archaeological treasure and transferred its inhabitants to a newly-constructed village nearby.

We inspected the monumental ruins for a couple of hours, and made friends with some Palestinian children. When the sun became merciless, we ducked into a large rock chamber that, we surmised, had once been someone's living room: it was dark and chilly inside. To our surprise, a Bedouin boy had fashioned the ancient cubicle into a tiny variety shop. We bought two Pepsis in old-fashioned six-ounce bottles.

Re-emerging into the daylight, we spotted a stout elderly Bedouin woman sipping tea. She was dressed all in black and sitting on a rock in the shade of some dwarfish trees. Ruba seemed to recognize her at once. "Did I say there were no more Bedouins living here anymore? No, that was wrong. She's the only one."

The Old Woman of Petra looked possibly 600 years old. She seemed somehow to embody all the old mysterious ways that live on in the Arabian desert. Her face was wrinkled and tattooed, her head kerchiefed, her teeth rotten, her black eyes reflecting an ineffable knowledge.

Ruba spoke with her in Arabic. "She won't let you take her picture," Ruba told me as we walked away, having read my mind.

"She lives here all alone. The rest of her tribe accepted the government relocation, leaving her behind. She says that Petra is her home and she doesn't want to leave."

A further revelation dispossessed me of the naive assumption that the old woman, living without modern conveniences, would know little of the world beyond her petrified city in the desert. She had surprised Ruba by asking about — of all things — the performance of certain commodities on the New York Stock Exchange.

"She told me her son married a Swiss woman and now works for a bank in Zurich. She's hoping his investments do well so that he can afford to bring her grandchildren here for a visit."

Casters company founder embodies Canadian dream

TORONTO — Max Guttmann, who embodies the Canadian corporate dream, will face a major adjustment in giving up something he started from scratch.

A destitute Holocaust survivor, he came to Canada, worked 100 hours a week to build Algood Casters, now a lucrative company, and then turned it over to his kids this year on the firm's 25th anniversary. For Guttmann, it's been a life of hope and hardship, of sacrifice and success.

One of the Guttmann sons, 30-year-old Craig, Algood's new president, remembers wishing to see more of his dad.

"Very often he would never come home for days, because he would be sleeping in the factory."

Guttmann himself admits to putting in punishing hours, with days running into nights on the factory floor. "I used to work from 8 a.m. to 2 a.m.," he recalls.

Guttmann was born 62 years ago in Czechoslovakia and moved to Hungary at the age of 3. In 1943, Hungary's Nazi occupiers kicked him out of school. He was 11 at the time, with four years of formal education, which, to this day is the extent of his schooling. When the war was over, Guttmann was one of the fortunate survivors, who had somehow been spared because his parents had placed him in an orphanage.

"I was 12½ years old. They asked for children who wanted to help, so I volunteered," he says.

Volunteering meant learning a trade — die making and machine building, courtesy of ORT (Organization for Rehabilitation & Training).

Six years later, with the help of the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society, he was on his way to Toronto, where finding work, by today's standards, was unbelievably easy. He accepted his first job offer the day he arrived.

Toronto in the early 50s was an intolerant town. Employers, private clubs and landlords thought nothing of barring Jews. Discrimination was standard procedure.

When Guttmann became the first Jew to be hired at Massey Harris, later to become Massey Ferguson, one of North America's major farm machinery manufacturers, he made labor history. But being accepted by his fellow workers wasn't so simple. Guttmann had taken off for Yom Kippur and returned to the taunting of a factory colleague who expressed regret about not having killed more Jews in Europe. His reaction was furiously instinctive.

"I picked up a hammer and started swinging until somebody stopped me."

Although Guttmann kept his job and the anti-Semite was transferred, other unpleasant incidents followed. One of the factory foremen threatened to fire him unless he could complete a specially designed task in a seemingly impossible amount of time.

"You little Jew boy," Guttmann remembers the foreman saying, "you won't finish the job. You'll get your ass kicked out of here." The result? "I finished the job in half the time."

Diverse product range

Craig Guttmann believes the persistent anti-Semitism his father faced prevented him from "sitting back while others were suffering and dying." His father joined several groups sponsoring Vietnamese boat people so they could come to Canada. He personally brought over one worker who is still employed at Algood.

Guttmann is, in fact, a soft touch for charitable causes. The list of recipients is long — Shearim Hebrew Day School, which teaches children with learning difficulties; Netivot Hatorah Day School; Or Chaim Yeshiva; the Mizrachi Zionist organization; Beit Halochem for wounded Israeli soldiers; ORT and many more.

By 1961, with a succession of employers behind him and $3,400 to start a new company, Guttmann and partner Keith Alexander created A & G Dies, Algood's predecessor. When A & G was bought out, Algood Casters Ltd. was born in 1969.

Although consumers tend to take casters on their furniture and shopping carts for granted, Guttmann never believed business would automatically come his way. He would load his car with casters at any time of the day for personal deliveries to clients, and he loved victory over imported casters based on price — the one significant selling point of his product.

When Algood was a less than prosperous corporate infant, there were two customers and $32,000 in annual sales. Today, Algood, 50 employees and 65,000 square feet later, serves over 700 customers, with coast to coast distributorships and sales in the millions. And whether it's 1969 or 1994, when it comes to customers, some things never change. "We spoil them rotten," Guttmann observes.

It's this personal pride, this "hands-on careful control," as Guttman describes it, that has allowed Algood to not just survive but flourish during the recession. Even before economic conditions deteriorated, Algood stopped concentrating primarily on the furniture market and diversified its product range.

"That way, when one market excelled, we felt it. When one market was depressed, we didn't," Craig observes.

In December 1990, Algood asked employees to forego raises and bonuses. They complied, saved their jobs and helped to pilot Algood through the economic storm.

Now, Algood is after the benefits of free trade. Already, 25 per cent of its business comes from the United States, which Craig considers untapped territory, and the company just picked up a Mexican customer.

With a solid sales base, a gigantic product line (some 25,000 caster variations) and 20 per cent growth expected this year, Algood is moving on to the next generation — sons Mark, Craig and Sean, with Craig running the company.

Why semi-retirement today, for Guttman and his wife Sheila when the founder and first president is only 62? The answer from Guttmann himself is typically practical and blunt.

"I want the company taken over when I'm still alive and still active to see the pleasure of them running it."

Signatel Ltd. sees increased trade with hi-tech Tel Aviv-based firm

By STEPHANIE CHAPMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Perhaps one of the more telling examples of change in the data communications industry is one cited by Maurice Kulik, owner of Signatel Limited, located in Markham.

In 1977, technology made it possible for people to send information over a computer link in two minutes; today, in that same time interval, we are able to send an entire encyclopedia over those links.

This dramatic increase in speed allows for current and therefore more usable information to be transferred. A definite asset in the field of communications.

Signatel is the exclusive Canadian distributor of hi-tech data communications products designed and manufactured by RAD, a Tel Aviv-based firm.

When The CJN first caught up with Signatel in August 1992, they had sole distributing rights for close to two years. Since that time, Signatel, which also represents many U.S. and Canadian firms, has "enjoyed increased business and association with more RAD companies," said Kulik.

He explained that after RAD was founded in 1980, the company started to effectively market and distribute products in Canada.

Signatel's initial decision to market RAD's technology was based on the fact that the equipment was of good quality and well priced.

Proof is in the profit. RAD has moved from making $100,000 in 1982 to $160 million a little more than a decade later.

"Something that most people don't know is that Israel is the second largest country of data communications, next to the U.S., and look at the difference in size," Kulik said.

He attributes the country's success in this sector to the unusual number of engineers — the highest per capita even before the Russian exodus. He adds that technology, computers and communications have also played an integral part in Israel's security.

"Israel has always had very smart, capable engineering design organizations. Their data communications has always been strong and the country produces some of the best in the world," Kulik said, adding it makes tremendous business sense to invest in Israel.

He refutes the idea of investing in Israel for sentimental reasons. Kulik said "I don't know any business man who would invest for those reasons."

While Kulik is delighted to be able to visit Israel for family and business, ultimately, he is interested in returns for the shareholders.

Kulik has no complaints about doing business in Israel but improvements can always be made. He says joint market projects and programs designed to address the Canadian market specifically would be beneficial but "you can only ask for so much."

He cites the seven-hour time difference as the only inconvenience. The solution: line up the faxes at night and the answers are waiting the next morning. No problem.

Although some maintain that no company is recession-proof, Signatel's area of expertise comes close. While many firms may opt to wait before incorporating advanced technology, for many downsizing means technology must fill the gap. Given this, Kulik says he is looking to double sales in the next three years.

By RUTH SCHWEITZER

TORONTO — People enjoy shopping for groceries at large stores because they like the selection and prices, said Charlie Coppa, co-founder and president of Highland Farms Inc. Low prices reflect the high volume of sales, he said.

However, he predicted that smaller stores would survive because "the smaller store is going to be used as a convenience."

In 1987 Coppa and his brother Louis opened their largest store, 120,000 square feet. Located on Dufferin Street north of Finch, the supermarket is the busiest of the three they currently own. Their stores at Ellesmere and Kennedy and Lawrence and Bennett Road are 6,500 and 25,000 square feet respectively.

According to Coppa some retailers regularly move merchandise from one area to another to force customers to shop in unfamiliar parts of the store and to expose them to products they might have passed by.

He said that Highland Farms does the reverse, ensuring that products stay on the same shelves for optimum customer convenience and ease of shopping. The giant Dufferin Street Highland Farms store can be overwhelming at first, but the consistency and the way the store is organized make shopping there easy, said Coppa.

The Dufferin Street store caters to shoppers from diverse backgrounds, including Italian, Portuguese, Greek, Chinese, Spanish and Jewish customers, carrying an unusual variety of ethnic foods. Kosher food, however, dominates, said Coppa, as the majority of the store's customers are Jewish. "The store is suited for Toronto today. It reflects the mix of people in Toronto. That's why we call it the international food experience."

Most of the produce at Highland Farms is imported from California, Florida, Texas and Mexico.

Coppa said Canada's free trade agreement with the United States has led to some reduction of duties on fresh fruit and vegetables but not to the elimination of duties, adding that the agreement is still being phased in.

For example, the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA), he said, has so far not affected duties on produce from Mexico. About 10 per cent of Highland's fresh fruit and vegetables come from Mexico. It will take awhile before duties are reduced.

When Ontario produce is available, Highland Farms carries it exclusively. During Ontario peach season, for instance, the stores do not sell American peaches.

Many of the grocery items on the shelves are manufactured in Canada by companies that have a U.S. parent. Since they are made in Canada, Coppa said, pricing has not been affected by our free trade agreement with the United States.

With reference to price, Coppa had some advice for today's price-conscious customers. It's a perception in the minds of many that if they buy items in large quantities, they will save significant amounts of money. He pointed out, however, that this is not always true.

He recommended that people who do not need large quantities should watch out for specials, as individual prices are sometimes lower than a single item in a large package.

He added that by buying specials, customers would avoid making a costly one-time investment and be able to enjoy a larger variety of products each time they went shopping.

Charlie and Louis Coppa got their start by working in grocery stores after school, beginning in their later years of elementary school. In 1963, when they were in their early 20s, they purchased their first grocery store with help from their family. The Highland Farms giant grew out of that 3,300 square-foot store in Toronto's west end.

International Training Program Grows

About 3,000 students from over 100 countries will be attending training courses in Israel this year, run by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The student population is about 600 higher than last year.

The courses, designed mostly for participants from developing nations in Latin America, Africa and Asia, started more than 40 years ago. They teach subjects in which Israel has recognized expertise, such as mother and infant care, modern irrigation systems and farm product marketing programs.

Some of the students come from countries that do not officially recognize Israel.

Nearly 50,000 people have benefited from the program since it began in the mid-50s.

Business forum nets returns despite Hebron massacre

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — The Fourth International Business Forum brought over 1,600 world business leaders and statesmen to Jerusalem recently to explore opportunities for doing business with Israel and to envision what the Middle East could look like in peacetime.

An estimated $45 million in transactions were conducted during the conference, according to organizers. That's about twice the amount of deals closed at the previous Forum held two years ago.

This year's conference, devoted to the theme of Making the Business of Peace a Reality, was marred by the Hebron massacre, which kept Palestinian and Egyptian representatives away and underscored the fragility of the peace process. But the fact that the conference attracted a record number of participants, including business leaders from Japan, China, India and several former Soviet republics was proof of something else: the unstoppable momentum driving more and more countries into economic partnerships with Israel.

"The world is opening up to us as never before," declared one Israeli conference participant.

Even the shadow cast by the Hebron massacre and its violent aftermath did not keep potential investors or statesmen away. "I never considered cancelling this visit," said Slovenian President Milan Kucan, who addressed the forum during his first trip to Israel.

"It seems difficult to speak of peaceful co-existence after [this] terrible tragedy," said Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin. "But let's not be blind to the great opportunities peace can bring to our people."

U.S. Vice-President Al Gore, addressing the Forum from Washington via video conference, called on the Arab world to end the economic boycott against Israel. "The boycott is anathema to peace," said Gore. "It's time to put an end to it."

Israeli and world leaders presented contrasting visions of what peace would mean to the Middle East from an economic perspective.

"Advancement of the peace process will make Israel a more attractive destination for foreign investment and will result in closer economic ties between Israel and its Arab neighbors," said Gore.

The vice-president added that the Israeli and Arab economies have much to offer one another and that these economic ties would bind the region together. He described a time in which "swords will be turned into ploughshares and personal computers. We will see a Middle East Economic Community that will work to improve health care, eradicate hunger, cleanse the environment, and perhaps even build super highways from the Mediterranean to the Gulf."

Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres also portrayed a sweeping vision of the region's promising economic future, centred on a Middle East Common Market. Peres bemoaned the fact that over the last decade, the Middle East has spent a trillion dollars financing the arms race.

"We took this money out of the mouths of our children. With half that money we could have built an entirely new Middle East," he declared.

The arms race can be halted only by a joint effort of all countries in the region, he said, declaring that goal to be "the call of our time."

But Bank of Israel governor Jacob Frankel presented a less sanguine view of the future. "We should not kid ourselves that in the early stages of the peace process the defense burden will be reduced," asserted Frankel.

He maintained that the risks which Israel assumes during the peace process will probably demand increased defense expenditures. "A peace dividend will not be felt for a long time to come."

Frankel also dismisses the notion of a Middle East Common Market. "Even in an era of peace I don't believe that Israel and the Arab world will have a huge common market like that of North America or Europe because the structure of our economies is very different." He noted that only four per cent of Saudi Arabia's trade and seven per cent of Egyptian trade is conducted within the Middle East. But Frankel predicted that peace would bring other benefits: increased investment, joint ventures and more links with other regions in the world.

Japanese economist Professor Makoto Utsumi declared that Israel has the potential to be a bridge between East and West. "Unfortunately, history has prevented Israel from assuming this role. But now the golden opportunity has arrived," said Utsumi, the former deputy economics minister of Japan.

For all the public rhetoric, the real work of the forum took place in private. Offstage, over 1,000 business representatives — from the president of Coca-Cola International to the vice-president of General Electric — made contacts and, in some cases, deals. Particularly striking were the number of business people from countries which have, until recently, had few links with Israel.

Shamiso Mapfunde, head of a Zimbabwe consultancy firm, was on his first visit to the country. He already does business with one Israeli firm, Teva Pharmaceuticals, which five months ago signed a $4 million contract to supply Zimbabwe with medical equipment.

Proposed fund set to establish business links

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — Organizers who are promoting a government financed research and development fund that supports Canada-Israel business links say they were very pleased with the response from representatives of local high-tech firms who attended an information meeting about the fund in Ottawa last week.

Paul Bregman, whose non-profit group, Forging Ottawa-Israel Links (FOIL), is publicizing the fund, said he was overwhelmed by the number of business people who asked him after the presentation about finding Israeli products and partners.

The $6 million fund was announced by the Conservative government in April 1993. Canada and Israel will each contribute $1 million per year for three years. The Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation, an independent organization that will be set up to manage the fund, will grant up to 50 per cent of a company's research and development costs, to a maximum of $300,000 per year, as long as at least 30 per cent of the money is spent in either Canada or Israel. It is modeled on a similar fund that has been working successfully in the United States since 1977.

Because the fund is small, it is intended to attract small and medium-sized businesses.

Applicants will have their proposals reviewed by a peer expert and evaluated with a minimum of bureaucratic delay, Henri Rothschild, chief scientist of Canada told guests at the seminar.

The foundation is not yet up and running, but it is expected to be officially launched within the next few months after the final details of its organization have been worked out. In the meantime, seminars at which interested firms can get information about the fund are scheduled for Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver.

Rothschild said the Canadian government is supporting the fund because it wants to promote research and development as well as increased trade with Israel.

"We're not enough of a nation of innovators or a nation of traders and anything we do that promotes both is in the interest of the Canadian economy," Rothschild said. "We also think R and D is a very good way to build industrial relations."

Bregman, president of FOIL, said Israel is a good place to invest in research and development. Thanks to the arrival of thousands of highly educated professionals from the former Soviet Union, there are more scientists and engineers per capita in Israel than in any other industrialized country. Graduates of Israeli universities are also highly regarded. Israel has managed to cut its inflation rate in half since 1989, has seen rising productivity, possesses modern roads and sewage systems and has loan policies that support business incentives, Bregman said.

He added that the similar Israel-U.S. Binational Industrial R&D Fund (BIRD) has been lucrative for the U.S. government. It has received an estimated $240 million in taxes from the sale of products developed through the support of the fund, Bregman said.

John Lung, vice-president of the FOIL group, said the BIRD fund, as it is called, began with an endowment of $30 million and is now at $137 million, "and flying."

Information meetings about the proposed Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation will be held March 18 at the Holiday Inn on Sherbrooke in Montreal, on March 21 at the Holiday Inn Yorkdale in Toronto, and on April 11 at the B.C. Club in Vancouver.

BEAUTIFYING THE SEDER

This turquoise, blue and gold matzah holder of handpainted and quilted silk is by Haya Nativ, a member of the Pomegranate Guild of Judaic Needlework. Israeli refugee claims drop

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — In the past two years, over 3,000 persons coming from Israel claimed refugee status in Canada, making Israel one of the country's largest sources of would-be refugees and certainly the only democracy to have produced so many.

The number arriving, however, decreased by more than half between 1992 and 1993, according to information released by the Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB). In 1992, 2,050 persons whose last country of permanent residence was Israel made refugee claims in Canada. Last year, there were 1,003.

Nevertheless, the IRB was busy catching up on the backlog of Israeli cases. In 1993, the Immigration Department referred 1,894 Israeli cases to the IRB for hearing, after they had passed the initial screening. (The right to make a refugee claim is not automatic.)

The IRB reported that it granted refugee status to 157 persons from Israel in 1993. It rejected the claims of 729 of the 1,077 claims it heard to completion, a process that takes an average of 7½ months, according to the board. Claims were withdrawn or abandoned by 303 persons.

The only other countries from which the IRB concluded more claims were: Iran (1,178), Pakistan (1,147), Somalia (2,348) and Sri Lanka (4,780).

Israel's position as a country with one of the highest number of refugee claims in Canada rose dramatically in 1992, compared to the 218 claims made in 1991 and 65 in 1990.

Of the 641 cases concluded in 1992, 68 from Israel were accorded refugee status under a two-stage hearing procedure that has since been streamlined. Only 12 were rejected at the initial hearing stage, while 103 cases were dismissed after a full hearing in 1992.

In its report last year, the IRB said that Jews originally from the former Soviet Union accounted for "a large percentage" of the claimants. The few cases that have come into the public eye over the past year, however, have involved mixed marriages or non-Jewish Soviets who had Jewish relatives in Israel.

The IRB does not issue detailed statistics on the ethnic or religious backgrounds of claimants.

Last May, then immigration minister Bernard Valcourt tried to stem the flow by imposing a visa on Israelis coming to Canada with the orange travel document issued to new Israeli citizens during their first year in Israel rather than a regular Israeli passport.

The ministry had found that an increasing number of holders of these temporary travel documents — namely recent immigrants to Israel — were using it to enter Canada and make refugee claims.

Eli Yerushalmi, counsellor at the Israeli Embassy, said no one coming from Israel has grounds to be considered a bona fide refugee as defined under the Geneva convention.

"Israel is a democratic country; there is no persecution and anyone can leave freely," he said. Although the embassy has no firm data, it is also his impression that most of the claimants are originally from the former Soviet Union.

"These people came to Israel on the way to somewhere else. They are using the refugee claim as an excuse to get into Canada quickly," he said.

He thinks the embassy can have little influence on the decisions of the IRB. "We provide information, but they are autonomous, even from the Immigration Department. They can decide what they want.

Yerushalmi hopes the number of refugee claimants will continue to decrease as Israel's economy improves.

Jewish Immigrant Aid Services does not accept as clients those who come here from Israel and claim refugee status, said national executive director Susan Davis, because the money raised by the Jewish community here is earmarked for their resettlement in Israel.

Last year, the IRB published Israel: Jews from the Former Soviet Union, a background paper for its board members, which discusses the problems of adjusting.

Soviet Jews who leave Israel "sometimes claim to have been victims of discrimination by other Israelis," the report says, but it also cites the Israel Religious Action Centre and Association for Civil Rights in Israel as stating there is no widespread discrimination against former Soviet Jews.

"The [Israeli] government's policies on issues such as absorption assistance, employment, housing and civil marriage will likely be a major factor in determining how well social tensions arising out of such a large influx of immigrants can be mitigated in the future," the report concludes.

As one woman making a refugee claim told CBC Radio in December: "I was too Jewish for Russia, and too Russian for Israel."

UN resolution on Hebron disappoints Jerusalem mayor

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — The mayor of Jerusalem, members of the U.S. Congress and nearly every major American Jewish organization have weighed in with immediate and harsh criticism of the United Nations resolution criticizing the Hebron massacre.

Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert sent a letter to U.S. President Bill Clinton expressing "shock and disappointment" that the U.S. government did not veto UN Security Council resolution 280.

The letter, released last Sunday, stated, "This resolution, which is intended to entice the PLO back to the negotiation table, will in fact create serious obstacles in the peace process" by raising "false and unrealistic expectations on the part of the Palestinians regarding the future of Jerusalem.

"The people of Israel will refuse to support any move that raises doubts as to the status of Jerusalem as the united capital of the State of Israel.

"As mayor of Jerusalem, and on behalf of all Jerusalemites, I have to express to you my deep disappointment that you did not instruct (UN) Ambassador (Madeleine) Albright to prevent the adoption of this resolution," the letter said.

The resolution, which was passed Friday — three weeks after the murder of at least 30 Palestinians at a Hebron mosque — criticized the killings, called for measures to guarantee that Palestinians be protected in the future and for the speedy implementation of the self-rule accord signed last September in Washington.

(Canada is not a member of the security council, and thus did not vote on the resolution.)

But the resolution's preamble contained language regarding Jerusalem that Jewish leaders found impossible to swallow.

NAHON tells teens they make a difference

Students debate weighty issues

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Teenagers can make a difference. That was one of the lessons that Jewish high school students from Toronto and Montreal took to heart at a recent three-day North American High School Organization Network (NAHON) convention held at Kingston's Howard Johnson's Hotel.

"We're not even 20 yet, but we can make such a difference," said Nadine Tobin, a student at York Mills Collegiate who served as a convention co-ordinator.

"Teens do have some influence and power," Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) student Sharrona Pearl, 16, told The CJN. Pearl, who was elected national chair of NAHON, was impressed by the number and calibre of speakers, among them Julius Ciss of Jews for Judaism, Paul Michaels of the Canada-Israel Committee, Daisy Moskowitz of Auberge Shalom (a kosher shelter for abused women) and Steven Shulman of Canadian Jewish Congress. Issues discussed included hate groups, a feminist approach to Judaism, and media perceptions of Israel.

"All these busy people came free of charge. It showed me that not only do people care about us [teens], but we can make a difference," said Pearl. "We got [close to] 100 kids out for the weekend just to listen to speakers, to educate themselves and learn about Jewish identity."

Pearl was also impressed with the student effort that went into planning the convention. (NAHON is entirely student-run.)

"We worked on this for five or six months, until all hours of the night," said Josh Spodek, a convention co-ordinator.

Spodek, a 16-year-old CHAT student, said he felt naches when he heard the give-and-take that went on for four hours with two representatives of Yachdav, a Montreal group for Jewish homosexuals and lesbians.

The session, which attracted a large number of students, prompted heated debate but ended on a positive note, according to students who were there. Josh Rucker, 18, of Thornhill, said that a friend of his who was initially hostile said that he left the session with "a better understanding.

Sharrona Pearl

"Overall, it was a positive discussion," said Rucker.

NAHON's objectives this year include an increased focus on outreach and strengthening Jewish identity, said Pearl.

Immediate past chair Itia Shmidman, of Montreal, explained that "a lot of Jewish students who go to public schools or who don't come from strong Jewish backgrounds feel there's no doorway to the Jewish community."

NAHON, like Network Canada, its counterpart for university students, is activist oriented. "NAHON's goals are to educate Jewish youth on issues that affect them as Jews, and to train them to become leaders and to take a stand on issues that concern them," said Chava Moss, a student at Montreal's Hebrew Academy High School.

Recently NAHON in Montreal raised $264 for Auberge Shalom, a kosher shelter for abused women, said Maya Cohen, advisor for NAHON's Eastern region. (Cohen is the daughter of Stephen Cohen of the Institute for Peace and Economic Development in the Middle East, who spoke at the convention on Israel and the peace process.) Currently students are working on a campaign on behalf of missing Israeli navigator Ron Arad and other Israeli MiAs.

Toronto students recently raised $600 for the Holocaust Memorial Museum with a project called Join Hands in Memory, a display of interlocking felt hands bearing the names of people who perished in the Holocaust.

NAHON, which has a presence across Canada, represents a variety of political and religious perspectives.

London panel puts media on spot

Must be more responsible in reporting

By MARA KOVEN
CJN Correspondent

LONDON — The media must take more responsibility in reporting. That was the consensus following a recent panel discussion at the Jewish Community Centre.

More than 100 people turned out to hear Jane Gilbert, co-host of Global Television's 5:30 p.m. newscast; Steve Paikin, a Hamilton-born Jew now hosting TVO's Between the Lines; London Free Press editor Phil McLeod; and community relations director Bernie Farber of the Canadian Jewish Congress discuss Media and Propaganda.

The well-attended event was sponsored by the Jewish community. It also drew people from the Anti-Racism Secretariat and those sympathetic to the media's "vilification" of Serbs.

Jacquie Gauthier, co-host of a local morning radio show, was moderator.

In apologizing for the shortcomings of daily television news, Gilbert encouraged the audience to balance their news diet by reading the newspaper and listening to the radio. She said a lack of resources does not always allow for foreign bureaus, and stations must rely on wire stories.

"With their news, comes their bias," she said referring to U.S. coverage of the Gulf War.

Another complaint levelled at television news is its relatively shallow coverage. Gilbert spoke of one Toronto station that declared international stories could be no longer than one minute and 15 seconds, since "the audience doesn't have the attention for more."

Steve Paikin disagreed. On his current affairs show Between the Lines, "we have the time to bring in six points of view and discuss an issue for two hours." But he did say the show's producers have two weeks to plan each show. "There isn't that luxury with daily reporting, which is subject to the tyranny of the clock."

London Free Press editor McLeod said that while the media need to report more responsibly, consumers must also be more discerning.

"[Both] the media and the customer have become willing partners in accepting propaganda," he said.

Farber addressed the issue of freedom of speech, which McLeod had earlier described as "vital, but not free. We pay a price for it."

Farber said the media has become more aware of hatemongers, but may not always be able to recognize their messages.

He spoke of headlines during the 1984 Ernst Zundel trial that read "No Scientific Proof Jews Gassed," but said that at the second Zundel trial three years later, "gone were the sensational headlines, the facts were reported and the media gave ample coverage to the prosecution."

Farber made a number of suggestions to the panel to help it report the news ojectively. Among them: understand the language of hate; bring context to stories through the use of experts; and train reporters as specialists, not generalists.

Winnipeg interfaith seder helps bring together minority groups

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Corresondent

WINNIPEG — This year, 1994, has been designated the Year of Racial Harmony by the United Nations.

In recognition of this, B'nai Brith Canada Mid-west region and The League for Human Rights held a special interfaith model Passover seder March 13 at the Rosh Pina Synagogue for ethnic groups.

The event was a resounding success, according to Sophie Tapper, executive director of the Mid-Western region. "We were sold out. It was a beautiful evening.

Tapper said 97 people attended the seder, many from the Caribbean, Sikh, Punjabi, Phillipino and Portuguese communities.

"Pesach ... is a tribute to life and the pursuit of religious and cultural freedom," said Tapper. "We felt that this holiday was an ideal vehicle for informing and educating other minority groups striving for freedom and justice in their societies as well as sharing Jewish culture and traditions with them."

Also at the seder was a contingent from Knox United Church in Kenora. Two years ago, the church leadership hosted an interfaith seder of its own to which were invited Kenora's small Jewish community and B'nai Brith Canada-Midwest region members. There were also people from rural Manitoba and representatives of the three levels of government.

Rabbi Allan Green of the Beth Israel Synagogue led the seder while Lyle Smordin, vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada and a vice-chair of the League for Human Rights, served as emcee. (The Rosh Pina, Winnipeg's second largest congregation, is currently between rabbis.)

The evening began with a tour of the sanctuary. Rabbi Green explained the history and meaning behind the objects in the sanctuary. At the seder site in the lower lounge, the rabbi explained the significance of the prayers, symbols on the tables and songs. The tables were set in the manner of a traditional seder.

One of the highlights, according to Tapper, was when Rabbi Green asked the youngest person in the room to step forward to recite the Four Questions. Noach Witman, 89, stood up and volunteered. The rabbi said perhaps Witman was the youngest in spirit.

"It was a very interesting evening," Tapper said. "People were enthusiastic. They were enraptured by Rabbi Green. They all thanked us after."

Congress adopts resolutions promoting cause of agunot

Public education on agenda

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The national executive of Canadian Jewish Congress has adopted a series of resolutions that put the organization squarely behind a nationwide effort to promote the cause of agunot, women denied Jewish divorces (get) by their husbands.

The resolutions call for public education, discussion of the issue in subsequent Congress conferences and executive meetings and taking "an active role in educating the legal community with respect to Canadian legislation which has an impact on the get issue."

Sheva Medjuck, chair of Congress' status of women committee, said that pursuant to one of the resolutions adopted unanimously at the recent meeting, Congress will seek to join the Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get. That organization comprises Emunah Women of Canada, Hadassah-WIZO, Women's Canadian ORT, B'nai Brith Women, Na'amat Canada and the Montreal and Toronto Jewish Women's Federations.

The coalition recently sponsored a series of vigils in seven Canadian cities to draw attention to the plight of agunot.

Congress has a role to play in the current groundswell of support for agunot, Medjuck said. In addition to its educational function through its regions across the country, Congress can "symbolically take a stand to show these are community standards and that the community will not tolerate abuse of the get."

One of the resolutions adopted by Congress states that it will "look with disfavor upon giving leadership roles to individuals who refuse to cooperate in the get process." A second resolution calls on the organization to "refrain from awarding honors to individuals who refuse to co-operate in the get process."

Congress also urged "all Canadian Jewish organizations, and in particular, synagogues, to adopt and adhere to the policies" set out in its resolutions.

Medjuck said the Congress committee "hopes to work closely with the International Coalition for Agunah Rights to hold ongoing talks with rabbis, synagogues and community leaders to find halachic solutions" to the problem.

In other discussions at the national executive meeting, the recent shakeup at the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) came under criticism from a number of fronts. Congress president Irving Abella told the meeting that Congress representatives had argued against structural changes to the community's pro-Israel lobby group.

Under the current format, CIC is a partnership of Congress, B'nai Brith Canada, the Canadian Zionist Federation, the United Israel Appeal and the federations in Toronto and Montreal. The board of the reconstituted CIC will be led by individuals who have ties to the community but who will not represent any particular group.

Congress has "no great enthusiasm in the new arrangement," Abella told the meeting.

Former Congress president Milton Harris said Congress could "do a much better job" at political advocacy than the CIC.

David Satok suggested that in meetings that led to the adoption of the CIC's new format, Congress' representatives did not do an adequate job of questioning the effectiveness of the CIC.

Louis Lenkinski noted that Congress' advocacy on behalf of Israeli soldiers missing in action and on the non-recognition of Israel's Magen David Adom by the International Committee of the Red Cross, shows how "Congress picked up the cudgels on these points." With the CIC based on a board consisting of people chosen "ad personam," its impact on government will be less than that of a CIC that operates under the auspices of various national organizations, he predicted.

Sharon blasts government

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Amid some controversy over the timing of his appearance here, Likud MK Ariel Sharon delivered a stinging attack on the Labor-led peace plan and settlement policies before a highly-receptive, standing-room-only crowd last week.

A truculent, hard line Sharon, accusing the Israeli government of abandoning the settlers and of grovelling more than ever before the PLO since the Feb. 25 Hebron massacre, received several standing ovations at the Beth Israel Beth Aaron Synagogue.

But Sharon's visit to raise funds for the settlements — amid very tight security — also raised a few hackles among those in the community who feared his presence in the city just 17 days after the massacre could put the community at risk.

"I want to thank [the synagogue's] Rabbi [Reuben] Poupko for the courage he showed in the face of these objections.

"Some people thought it would be dangerous for the Jews if I appeared. Thank God you were not caught up in the panic."

Sharon's 45-minute address, organized by YESHA (the group's English name is Council for Judea and Samaria), was marked by an emotionally-charged tirade against Israeli government policies and by an appeal to the audience to support the settlers, the "pioneers of the Jewish people."

The former Israeli defence minister described the massacre in Hebron by settler Dr. Baruch Goldstein as a "disgusting event."

But this has not justified the Israeli government capitulating and bowing and scraping before the PLO to get the peace talks jump-started again, he argued.

"You can only call it surrender," Sharon said, in describing Israel's concessions and promise to disarm settlers.

Sharon said settlers have as much right to live in Hebron — "where Jews have been living for 4,000 years" — as they do in Haifa and Tel Aviv.

He was also upset by Jewish breast-beating over the massacre.

"When Arafat's PLO killed 20 Jews in Istanbul in 1986, did any Arab government appoint a commission of inquiry?" asked Sharon rhetorically.

Sharon used strong language in characterizing Israeli policies towards the "Jewish communities," a term he prefers to "settlements."

They comprise the "last line of defence" against the creation of a Palestinian state, he contended.

More generally, Sharon characterized the Israeli-PLO Declaration of Principles (DOP) as a folly creating "maybe the most dangerous situation" for Israel since the War of Independence in 1948.

Sharon said the three greatest dangers Israel faces are continued Arab hatred, Arab arms build-up and "Arab and Palestinian" terror.

At one point, to some applause, he called the term "Palestinians...a modern invention."

Journal slammed for crude attacks

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A journal that attacks international financiers, employs crude caricatures of avaricious bankers and suggests they are attempting to create "a one-world government" has come under fire from Canadian Jewish Congress and the minister responsible for the Post Office.

The Michael Journal has borrowed the imagery associated with the anti-Semitic Protocols of the Elders of Zion, said Steven Shulman, associate director of community relations for Congress. A prominently-displayed caricature in the journal parallels a commonly-used cartoon in the Protocols and other anti-Semitic materials, Shulman said. It shows an avaricious banker grasping the globe in his clutches.

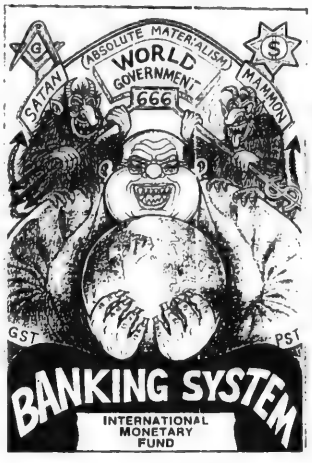
Similar imagery often adorned the covers of the Protocols and was employed by the Nazis in their propaganda, he said.

The Protocols were a forgery concocted by the Czarist secret police that aimed at showing an international Jewish conspiracy to dominate the world.

Shulman pointed out that the Michael Journal never employs the word "Jew." However, "the villains are identified as bankers and financiers. They involve stereotypes of international conspiracies. They characterize the bankers as new arrivals who contribute nothing to Canada and who systematically enslave the population through financial coercion."

David Dingwall, the federal minister responsible for Canada Post, was quoted in the Globe and Mail as calling on the Post Office to stop delivery of the material. Dingwall's office did not return numerous calls from The CJN.

Shulman said the Michael Journal, which is published by The Pilgrims of Saint Michael in Rougemont, Que., was delivered during a three-week period in late January to various locations in the Toronto area, Kitchener-Waterloo, Calgary and British Columbia. The first complaint received by Congress about the material, which was delivered as a bulk mail advertisement, came from its Pacific region.



A caricature of a greedy banker in an issue of the Michael Journal (left) draws on the same imagery as this cover illustration from a French edition of the Protocols of the Elders of Zion (right).

In the Michael Journal's issue of September-October 1993, an article accuses international bankers of being "inspired by Mammon himself. Their authority is exerted over trade, industry and each one of us, in every country. These bankers have no conscience, no morals; they are the authors of wars, depressions and bloody revolutions.

"The name 'banker' is synonymous with High Finance, the International Monetary Fund and the masonic World Bank. Their goal is to bring all the nations on earth to a one-world government; that is to say, to an absolute dictatorship, to total economic and political Communism, to complete atheistic materialism."

The Pilgrims did not return repeated calls from The CJN requesting an interview.

NIF stresses need for equality in Israel

Country could pay steep price without it

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — After the Sept. 13 signing of the Declaration of Principles between Israel and the PLO, Avi Armoni, director of the New Israel Fund (NIF) in Israel, was asked whether he felt the Fund's work on Jewish-Arab coexistence was still relevant.

"I said then that society in Israel will be subject to many traumatic experiences because of the peace process," he recalls. "Now, a few months later, I think those who believe in coexistence, tolerance and democracy are even more important."

The Fund, a joint effort of Israelis, North Americans and Europeans to address social and economic issues in Israel, underwrites more than two dozen programs addressing coexistence issues, including B'Tselem (an organization which monitors human rights in the territories); the Adam Institute for Democracy and Peace (teaching civil rights concepts to Jewish and Arab students and teachers); and the Jewish-Arab Centre for Economic Development (which helps facilitate joint Jewish-Arab business ventures).

"Co-existence depends on equality," Armoni told The CJN in a recent interview on one of two Canadian stops (the other was Montreal) as part of a North American tour to meet with media and NIF supporters.

"It's clear that [Arab Israelis] get much less than others. [Arab] municipalities get almost a third [as much government funding] as equivalent Jewish municipalities," he said. "It's not necessarily a matter of discrimination. In many cases it's a matter of [the local Arab government] not knowing how to apply for what is there. There is a need for empowering and giving better management tools to Arab communities."

Together with the American Joint Distribution Committee and the Israeli Ministry of the Interior, the NIF has recruited urban planners to facilitate change in two Arab communities.

"In the region near Nazareth," said Armoni, "an industrial zone is being developed that belongs jointly to the Jewish town [of Upper Nazareth and [four neighboring Arab municipalities]." To Armoni's knowledge, the project is the first joint venture between municipalities.

Avi Armoni

In the Arab city of Sakhnin, in the Galilee, the Arab staff person, an MBA, "covered the entire budget for the year just by computerizing the data on those who have not paid municipal taxes. It's very elementary sometimes, but the multiplier effect is tremendous," Armoni said.

Arab riots that followed the recent Hebron mosque massacre by Kach extremist Baruch Goldstein are a sign of "a general feeling of frustration and helplessness at being 'second-class citizens'," said Armoni. He believes the inequities between Jews and Arabs "at this stage are not intended," noting that the Israeli government has "decided to take affirmative action and to invest more in the Arab sector."

It is too early to tell whether the Hebron attack will affect support for the New Israel Fund, said Armoni. Their support has grown steadily over the past few years, reflected by their $10 million 1994 budget, up from $9.2 for 1993.

Armoni believes that if Israel doesn't address inequities in access to resources and jobs, it may pay a steep price in years to come. "If Israeli Arabs feel unequal five or ten years from now," he said, "they may choose to have their towns become autonomous and join [a future] Palestinian entity. That is an existential threat to Israel."

Giving Arabs equality is "the morally and pragmatically right thing to do."

The NIF does not fund projects outside Israel's Green Line (although B'Tselem monitors human rights in the territories). "I don't think it's our mandate [to fund projects beyond the Green Line], but we would be the first to share information and know-how," said Armoni.

"It is B'Tselem's belief that infringements of human rights in the territories impact on Israeli society," he said. The organization made headlines last summer with the release of its controversial report on the killing of Palestinian children by Israeli security forces.

"The IDF is coping very bravely, generally, with a situation it shouldn't be in," he maintains. "It is an army, not a police [force]."

When asked what he sees as the best way of resolving the issue of the territories, Armoni answered, "Whatever the eventual results of the peace process will be; whatever will be accepted by both sides."

Armoni noted that the mayor of Haifa led a joint Arab-Jewish march down the streets of downtown Haifa following the Hebron massacre. Both Israeli and Palestinian flags were carried, and there were no incidents of violence, he said. He noted that, while Haifa Arabs are "better off" than other Arabs in Israel, they are not as well off as the Jewish population.

Jews and Arabs who wish to continue with the peace process are willing to make compromises, Armoni said, noting that there is a concurrent growth in the number of Jewish and Palestinian fundamentalists who say there is no way to co-exist peacefully.

Armoni sees the NIF's mission statement — strengthening democracy in Israel — as "the exact antidote to fanaticism."

Although he says he is an optimist, Armoni expressed concern about "the price [Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak] Rabin has to pay to get the peace process going" in terms of concessions to Israel's ultra-Orthodox parties.

Religious pluralism and women's issues are two areas in which Armoni foresees little progress while the peace process is under way.

One bright note for Israeli women is the meeting held late last year between women's rights advocate Alice Shalvi of the Israel Women's Network (an NIF grantee) and Israel's two chief rabbis, who have agreed to try to find a halachically acceptable solution to the problem of agunot (women whose husbands will not give them a Jewish divorce).

Galandauer gets prison term after pleading guilty to charges

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Andor Galandauer will serve five years and eight months in prison after pleading guilty to 10 charges related to drug trafficking, possession of prohibited arms, passport forgery, attempted fraud and receiving stolen goods.

In exchange, the Crown dropped two drug-related charges, as well as the two counts of making false declarations. A break-and-enter charge was changed to attempted fraud, and the amount of heroin cited in one count was reduced.

Rabbi Meyer Krentzman, also of Montreal, had previously pleaded guilty to a variety of related charges in all but the arms and forgery cases. A third man, Vishwanadhan Thamotharampillai, earlier pleaded guilty to three related drug charges.

On prosecutor Mario Dufresne's recommendation, Quebec Court judge Yves Lagace sentenced Galandauer, 45, to a total of seven years less a month. But 15 months are to be served concurrently with the five years and eight months' punishment for the drug-related counts.

The judge credited Galandauer with four months' time against his sentence for the two months he has been held at the Parthenais detention centre since his arrest Jan. 19.

In addition, Lagace ordered that Galandauer is not permitted to own arms for 10 years after his release from prison.

Galandauer pleaded guilty to conspiring with Rabbi Krentzman and Thamotharampillai to traffic drugs between Nov. 17, 1993 and Jan. 12, 1994.

He pleaded guilty to trafficking one gram of cocaine Nov. 17, one kilo of cocaine on Dec. 6 (for an asking price of $33,000), and one gram of heroin Jan. 12. All transactions were with an undercover police officer. Another admitted charge of possession of 81 grams of heroin for the purpose of trafficking was reduced to 50 grams.

The two charges withdrawn were conspiracy to traffic and the trafficking of 30 grams of heroin Jan. 19. Galandauer's lawyer Leonard Waxman told court his client was not present at the time of this transaction. Rabbi Krentzman pleaded guilty to the latter charge.

Lagace briefly reprimanded Galandauer. "I can't understand how a man like you could traffic drugs," he said.

The two gun convictions added another six months to Galandauer's sentence. He pleaded guilty to possession of eight prohibited arms and to improper storage of 23 other weapons.

Waxman said his client has been a gun collector and recreational marksman for many years, and had permits for each of the guns.

However, the gun laws were stiffened last year and Galandauer failed to comply with the new legislation, he said.

Thus, two of the arms — Bush Master rifles — became illegal and owners should have turned them in. The other six guns were prohibited because they were equipped with a larger magazine capacity than permitted under the new law.

These eight guns and the ammunition were confiscated and will be given to the police laboratory.

Galandauer also pleaded guilty to storing his 23 other guns loaded or near ammunition in his home. Lagace gave Galandauer one year to get rid of these guns, or they, too, will be confiscated. They will be held in the exhibit room of the courthouse during that time.

This means Galandauer can sell or give the guns to someone with valid permits. Waxman estimated that the collection is worth at least $25,000.

Among the other charges, Galandauer pleaded guilty to possessing equipment to produce false passports and receiving stolen goods, namely audio and video gear, for which he received three months each. Both were found at his place of business.

Rabbi Krentzman earlier pleaded guilty to the two charges of issuing false declarations dropped against Galandauer. Rabbi Krentzman acted as guarantor in the passport applications of two persons — since convicted of fraud — who he had known for much less time than the two years required by law.

The break-and-enter count was changed to attempted fraud when Galandauer and Rabbi Krentzman confessed to trying to simulate a burglary of a St. Laurent home for the purpose of defrauding an insurance company, in collaboration with the property owner.

Court heard that the bungled caper last December ended in the arrest of Galandauer and Rabbi Krentzman because the homeowner forget to tell his brother, who was in the dwelling at the time, that the phony break-in was to occur. The brother called the police.

The homeowner has not been charged at time of writing.

Galandauer received three months for this count.

After the sentencing, Waxman told The CJN that the RCMP had investigated Galandauer and Rabbi Krentzman's activities, but the matter is now closed.

Speculation about their being connected to international crime is "nonsense," he said.

Galandauer should be eligible for parole after serving one-third of the sentence.

Heritage Front defector testifies

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A defector from the white supremacist Heritage Front testified last week that members of the racist group intended to keep the organization's telephone hotline operating under different names, despite a court order to shut it down.

Elisse Hategan, 19, told a Federal Court hearing that a hotline operated by Equal Rights for Whites was started after the Heritage Front was ordered to shut down its own hotline. She said Front leader Wolfgang Droege said nothing the Canadian Human Rights Commission (CHRC) could do would stop the group. He said other hotlines would spring up to take the place of lines shut down by the CHRC.

Hategan was testifying at a Federal Court hearing to determine whether Droege and Front members Ken Barker and Gary Schipper had violated a previous court order preventing the Heritage Front from offering racist telephone messages.

The case was initiated when Canadian Jewish Congress learned of Front messages that attacked Native Canadians. It brought the messages to the attention of the Native Canadian Centre, which launched a complaint to the CHRC. The CHRC received a court order banning the Front from offering racist telephone messages.

In more than two days of testimony, Hategan described her involvement and disillusionment with the Heritage Front. A native of Bucharest, Romania, Hategan came to Canada with her family at age 11. She said she dropped out of school after Grade 9 .

At 16, she first became interested in the Heritage Front, though she admitted to previous racist feelings about blacks and Asians.

Hategan said she sought out the Front after seeing members of racist groups on a U.S. television show. She was welcomed into the group and felt the members were her comrades, she said. The group became the major focus of her life.

Her racist education was fed by materials supplied by Holocaust-denier Ernst Zundel as well as writings distributed by the Front. She began delivering speeches for the organization as well as writing telephone messages for the hotline.

Hategan said that in February, 1993 she was charged with defamatory libel and later with promoting hatred in connection with flyers that pictured a black man next to an ape.

She said she became disillusioned with the Front when members suggested she take the rap on the charges to protect others who had previous criminal convictions.

She said she was also upset over its strategy of harassing and playing dirty tricks on female anti-racists. She said the Front would gain access to answering machines and threaten and harass the activists. Other times they would call the activists' bosses and tell them their employee was a "Bolshevik."

In May, her despair coupled with the feeling she couldn't leave the group prompted a suicide attempt. In August, she approached the Canadian Centre on Racism and Prejudice and agreed to gather information for them. In November, she announced her defection.

Memorial programs planned for Friedberg's yahrzeit

JERUSALEM — Memorial programs marking the first anniversary of the death of Yehoshua (Jason) Friedberg, a former Montrealer and student at the Rothberg School for Overseas Students of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, were held this month under the auspices of the university's Hecht Synagogue.

Friedberg was a new immigrant and a soldier in the Israel Defence Forces' yeshiva/military program at the time of his death. He was abducted by terrorists and shot on March 7, 1993. He was on his way to take an officers' qualifying examination. His body was found several days later near the Jerusalem-Tel Aviv Highway. He was 24.

While a student at the Rothberg School in 1987-88, Yehoshua participated in the Beit Midrash study program at the Hecht Synagogue. He later returned to that program as a volunteer tutor in 1991-92.

A Judaica library for use by students and others was dedicated in his name at the Hecht Synagogue last year and has grown rapidly in size.

At the memorial programs this month, a session of the Beit Midrash study program was dedicated to Friedberg's memory. Later that week, on the anniversary of his death, some 80 friends gathered at the Hecht Synagogue for an evening of Torah study and words of remembrance, in which Friedberg's devotion to the study and practice of Judaism and his qualities of sincerity and consideration for others were stressed.

The following day a memorial service was held at his gravesite on Mt. Herzl in Jerusalem.

UIA mission met Israeli leaders

JERUSALEM — The United Israel Appeal (UIA) of Canada hosted a special mission to Israel last month for campaign chairs from across Canada.

The brief program ran from Feb. 13 to 18, and was headed by UIA president Gerry Halbert and executive vice-president Steve Ain.

The 14-member group met with Deputy Defence Minister Motta Gur; Yaakov Frenkel, governor of the Bank of Israel; Jewish Agency Board chair Mendel Kaplan; and Canadian Ambassador Norman Spector. They visited the immigrants' information centre in Netanya, Canada Centre in Metulla, Mevo'ot Hermon near the "Confrontation Line" with Lebanon, the Community Centre in Kfar Yona, the Day Care Centre in Kfar Gvirol, and the city of Or Yehuda.

The closing dinner was adressed by Rachel Jiddish, rescued from Sarajevo by the Joint Distribution Committee and the Jewish Agency and reunited with her young sons in Israel.

Two of the mission participants, Harvey Levenson and Dale Boidman of Montreal, had visited the Muslim republics of the former Soviet Union. They talked about the vibrant life of Jewish communities and the good work carried out by Jewish Agency emissaries.

Congress celebrates 75 years

Past presidents look back

In accepting the nomination to the presidency of Canadian Jewish Congress in 1971, my statement included the following, which still holds true today: If Canada is a mosaic of people, so too Canadian Jewry itself is a mosaic of many patterns. Congress's job is to be the forum where such diversities are recognized and champions of dozens of views can reason together. Congress declares itself to be the parliament of Canadian Jewry. It has earned this title. Where else but in such a parliament should matters be aired, where the debate should lead to mandates for action?

Sol Kanee (1971-1974)

It is time now to remember first principles. Congress is the only body representative of the entire Canadian Jewish community. It therefore has no ties to any political party whether in Canada or elsewhere and its function in the Canadian polity is the furtherance of social and communal well being for all, an objective for which we have successfully striven in the past and to which we dedicate our future.

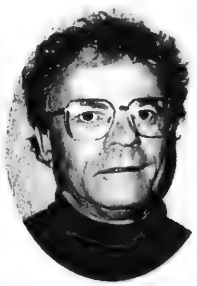
Sidney M. Harris (1974-1977)

For 75 years, Congress has been Canadian Jewry's unique symbol of communal unity. Because we have worked and spoken together, we have achieved an enviable record and have helped to make us a great and admired Diaspora community. Our tasks remain urgent and our opportunities undiminished.

Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut (1977-1980)

Canadian Jewish Congress's 75th anniversary offers an opportunity for reflection and renewal, for celebration and recommitment; to reflect upon as we celebrate 75 years of what is not only one of Canada's oldest and most pre-eminent Jewish organizations, but also one of Canada's oldest and pre-eminent human rights organizations; and to renew — as we recommit — that sense of continuity and creativity in all things Jewish and human that is CJC's most cherished and historic achievement. And that for me is CJC's most inspiring memory.

Irwin Cottler (1980-1983)



Seventy-five years ago, the Canadian Jewish Congress was formed to deal with the problems, and opportunities, facing Canadian and world Jewry in the aftermath of the First World War. My wife's father was an elected delegate to that first Congress Plenary here in Montreal. In 1939, another Congress Plenary met in Toronto to cope with an impending tragedy of then unimaginable dimensions. My father was an elected delegate to that Plenary. For more than thirty years, I have been proud to be a delegate to a democratically elected Congress where Jews from right across the country, and from every walk of life, participate in the decision making process in our national community.

Milton Harris (1983-1986)

Throughout these past 75 years, the Jewish community of Canada has grown and thrived in Canada, a country which has provided a safe haven for its citizens. The Canadian Jewish Congress, as the voice of Canadian Jewry to the Canadian government during the period, has played an essential role in the enrichment and development of the quality of life in Canada. Please accept my best wishes for continued success in these important endeavors.

Dorothy Reitman (1986-1989)

The Jewish community of Canada is one which reflects a healthy and constructive diversity of interests, commitments and priorities. Canadian Jewish Congress has always been a unique forum which has encouraged the free exchange of ideas, opinions and views. It represents the total national Jewish community from Halifax to Vancouver, and it is the people who make Canadian Jewish Congress what it is. It is people who come together for the common good, who are committed and dedicated to the welfare and survival of the Jewish people throughout the world.

Kach leader said ready to surrender

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Baruch Marzel, leader of the outlawed Kach movement, is ready to surrender to police under certain conditions, his wife was reported to have said on Sunday.

Marzel wants Rabbi Avraham Ravitz, a member of the Knesset from the United Torah Judaism bloc, to supervise the move, said Sarah Marzel.

Baruch Marzel has been a fugitive since Kach was outlawed as a terrorist organization by the Israeli government in the wake of the murders at the Hebron mosque on Feb. 25.

The gunman, Baruch Goldstein, was a member of the extreme right-wing nationalist movement that was set up by the late Rabbi Meir Kahane.

Ravitz said he had known Marzel, whose family are his neighbors, since he was born.

He said that he was waiting to hear Marzel's conditions, and that in the meantime he had received the unofficial approval of Police Minister Moshe Shahal to act as an intermediary.

Shahal has said that he will not accept any conditions that Marzel seeks for his surrender.

Sarah Marzel said she feared the security forces would shoot her husband, who she declared was unarmed, if he gave himself up unsupervised.

In a related development, the Association for Civil Rights in Israel, a group generally known for defending Arabs in trouble with the authorities, has agreed to provide legal counsel for Noam Federman, the Kach spokesman who has been in administrative arrest for two weeks.

The civil rights group believes administrative detention is undemocratic.

Palestinians may get Hebron police

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The Israeli team meeting over last weekend in Tunis with Yasser Arafat received instructions to tell the PLO leader that Israel is ready to set up a municipal Palestinian police force in Hebron, according to reports here.

Israel is also reportedly ready to weigh the establishment of a Palestinian police presence in other West Bank cities and to accept the temporary presence of unarmed international observers there.

Efforts will be made to recruit the police force from among Palestinians who served in such West Bank units before their mass resignations at the start of the intifada in December 1987.

The units, if established, will be under the control of the Israeli authorities.

Meeting with Arafat in Tunis on Sunday were Uri Savir, the director-general of the Foreign Ministry; the army deputy chief of staff, Amnon Shahak; Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's special political adviser, Jacques Neria; and Yoel Singer, the Foreign Ministry's legal adviser.

The team's mission is part of an ongoing effort to restart negotiations with the PLO, which suspended the talks after the Feb. 25 killings of at least 30 Palestinians worshipers at the Tomb of the Patriarchs in Hebron.

The Israeli team, which met with Arafat on Sunday night, discussed the PLO's demands for measures to guarantee the safety of Palestinians in the territories.

The team will reportedly tell PLO officials that Israel is ready to consider new arrangements for prayers by Jews and Arabs at the Tomb of Patriarchs in an effort to minimize friction between the two groups.

But the delegation has also reportedly been instructed to reject PLO demands that Israeli settlers be disarmed and barred from entering Palestinian enclaves.

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

FRUCHTMAN

My correspondent Fruitman (nee Fruchtman) writes that most of the Fruitmans come from Slipya Nova, Poland.

The name is quite common and may derive from two different sources. It may refer to the tribe of Ephraim, whose name comes from the Hebrew word for fruit. Or it may be like Apfel (apple), Kirsch (cherry), Pomerantz (orange) and Citron (lemon).

Mosque ban on Jews angered Goldstein

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Ilan Tor, the last person known to have seen Baruch Goldstein alive, last week told the official commission investigating the Hebron mosque massacre that Goldstein was angry over the closure of the Muslim prayer area to Jews, especially since it was Purim.

Tor was one of 15 witnesses appearing Sunday.

Tor, a settler, said he met Goldstein moments before the Kiryat Arba doctor opened fire in the mosque, in an area between the separate Jewish and Muslim sections of the Tomb of the Patriarchs.

One man asking to be heard by the five-member panel chaired by Israeli Chief Justice Meir Shamgar, is reserve officer Shlomo Idelstein. On the morning of the killings, Idelstein said, he received an urgent phone call from Goldstein's wife, Miriam.

Miriam Goldstein, Idelstein said, asked him to intercept her husband, whom she said had not gone to the Tomb of the Patriarchs — a site holy to Jews and Muslims alike — simply to pray.

Idelstein tried to locate Goldstein, but failed to reach him on an emergency beeper.

Idelstein has written to the panel asking to give testimony about the month of reserve service he spent in Kiryat Arba, where Goldstein lived.

In earlier testimony last week, two soldiers who were on guard duty at the Tomb of the Patriarchs on the day of the massacre have come forward with testimony that contradicts the Israeli army version of what took place on Feb. 25.

"We saw (Goldstein) with an M-16," Sgt. Kobi Yosef told the commission.

"About five minutes after him, another man entered with a Galil (assault rifle) strapped against his body," Yosef said.

His testimony was supported by Pvt. Nir Drori who, along with Yosef, had been positioned at one of the gates leading into the mosque on the day of the killings.

Their statements directly contradicted the official army accounts, and provided some support to statements by Palestinians that more than one man had been involved in the shooting.

According to officials of the Israel Defence Force, Goldstein had acted alone.

Army investigators, who had found shell casings on the floor of the mosque after the killings, said all the casings had come from an Israeli-made Galil assault rifle. No shells from an M-16, an American-made weapon, were found at the scene.

The two soldiers further testified that they had fired toward the crowd of Muslim worshipers that came stampeding from the mosque after Goldstein opened fire.

Drori testified that he shot three or four times, and Yosef said he fired one bullet. Both denied that their fire had struck any worshippers.

The soldiers said they had feared for their lives, believing a Palestinian was shooting inside the mosque. Their gunfire, they stated, had been intended to stop the worshippers from pouring out of the mosque.

Earlier, Lt. Rotem Ravivi, the only Israeli officer who was inside the Tomb of the Patriarchs at the time, had testified that he had seen Goldstein carrying a Galil rifle.

Ravivi described Goldstein as a "good guy," a man who could be trusted.

He also testified that Goldstein's car was one of only three civilian vehicles permitted to park in an IDF area near the mosque.

There was some disagreement among the soldiers regarding the controversial standing orders to never open fire on Jewish settlers.

Some claimed to be aware of the orders, while at least one said he was not. Some added that they would not have obeyed the orders because they were illogical.

Border policemen, accompanied by attorneys, also testified before the commission. The lawyers were present because the men had failed to be at their posts on the morning of the killings, and the policemen required the presence of counsel to prevent them from implicating themselves while testifying before the panel.

UN Hebron resolution angers Jewish leaders

Within hours of the resolution's passage, condemnation of its language was issued by leading Jewish organizations, including the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, the National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council, B'nai B'rith, the Zionist Organization of America and the American Zionist Movement.

Referring to "territories occupied by Israel in June 1967, including Jerusalem," the preamble's avowal that Jerusalem was occupied territory flew in the face of a prime dictum of the Israeli and American Jewish leadership — that Jerusalem is the eternal and undivided capital of Israel.

In a compromise formula worked out before the resolution came to a vote, the United States was able to abstain on this and another paragraph of the preamble while being able to approve the resolution as a whole.

In addition to abstaining on the paragraph about the status of Jerusalem, the United States abstained on a second paragraph that said the Hebron attack "underlines the need to provide protection and security for the Palestinian people."

A paragraph in the main body of the resolution, which the United States supported, called for an international presence in the territories, "which was provided for in the declaration of principles" that formed the basis of the Palestinian self-rule accord.

Israeli officials have supported the idea of an unarmed international presence in the territories, stressing that this was a point already negotiated in the Declaration of Principles, signed last year.

While the United States twice abstained during the voting, the 14 other members of the Security Council voted for every paragraph in the resolution.

During their negotiations leading up to the Security Council vote, American officials had operated on the belief that passage of the resolution was key to restarting the Israeli-PLO negotiations, which were halted by the PLO after the Hebron murders.

And indeed, the U.S. approach did bear fruit. Following the resolution's passage, U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher announced at a hastily called news conference that Syria, Jordan and Lebanon had agreed to return to Washington next month to resume negotiations with Israel.

The Clinton administration, expecting harsh fallout from critics of the resolution, has been hard at work on damage control.

In a conference call with leaders of the 50 member organizations of the Conference of Presidents, before the Security Council vote Friday, Vice President Al Gore reaffirmed the administration's position recognizing a united Jerusalem as the capital of Israel.

Asserting that a U.S. veto might have prevented the peace talks from resuming, Gore explained that the United States would have exercised its veto if the reference to Jerusalem had been in an operative paragraph of the resolution rather than in its preamble.

The News in Brief

National Ballet to Israel

TORONTO — The National Ballet of Canada will soon embark on an eight-city, five-week tour of Europe and Israel. While in Israel, the company is scheduled to perform outdoors at Jerusalem's Sultan's Pool May 25 and 26, and in the Roman amphitheatre in Caesaria May 28 and 29. The tour will involve 130 people, including 11 students from the National Ballet School.

AI Calls for Rights Monitors

OTTAWA — In the wake of last month's Hebron massacre, Amnesty International (AI) has called on Israel to conduct a review of the way its security forces have been policing the territories. AI is also renewing its call for the introduction of on-site monitoring of human rights in the territories. The monitors' mandate would cover the actions of both Israeli and Palestinian security forces. AI said it welcomes Israel's establishment of a judicial inquiry into the Hebron killings.

Court Ruling Slammed

TORONTO — Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, says a German court's ruling last week that denying the Holocaust does not in itself amount to incitement of racial hatred "will allow neo-Nazis to dance on the graves of Holocaust victims." Littman said the ruling might embolden Canadian extremists to seek a reversal of the ban that prevents British-born Holocaust revisionist David Irving from entering Canada.

Jewish groups in Germany and North America condemned the ruling by Germany's highest appeal court, which ordered a new trial in the case of Guenter Deckert, who had been convicted of claiming that gassings at Auschwitz never happened.

Canadian Jewish Congress has sent a letter to the German ambassador expressing its "deep concern about this decision and urging a review of the matter," said Hal Joffe, national chair of community relations for Congress.

"We think [the decision] sets an unfortunate precedent in a country that has taken a lead role in maintaining the memory of the Holocaust and ensuring that Holocaust-denial is seen as anathema to the world conscience," he said.

CIUT Complaint Resolved

TORONTO — A complaint lodged in December with the Canadian Radio-Television & Telecommunications Commission (CRTC) by Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Ontario region has been resolved.

The complaint concerned comments made on the November 19 segment of African Woman and Family, a one-hour talk show on the University of Toronto radio station, CIUT. A letter to Louis Lenkinski of CJC from Allan Darling of CRTC notes that the station and program hosts "agree ... that the statements are anti-Semitic" and that apologies were broadcast on several occasions.

Darling also pointed out that the station has taken steps to prevent a repeat incident, including increased training of new and existing volunteer programmers.

"We're prepared to close the book" on the incident, said CJC's Bernie Farber.

Arab MK's Syria Visit

JERUSALEM — After being warmly greeted in Damascus, the head of a delegation of Israeli Arabs who paid a recent visit to Syrian President Hafez Assad received a decidedly cool reception on his return home.

The 57-man delegation's four-day trip made history as the first Israeli mission to travel officially to Syria.

But Knesset member Abdel Wahab Darawshe of the Arab Democratic Party raised hackles back home in comments going far beyond expressing sympathy on the death of Assad's son in a traffic accident a few weeks ago.

"Would that the position of Arabs in Israel resembled the position of the Jews in Syria," Darawshe said to journalists in Damascus. He extolled Syria, under its "very popular and beloved leader" as "a stronghold of liberty."

Israeli Students Turn Violent

JERUSALEM — Israel's students turned violent last week when an agreement designed to end a 70-day strike by university teachers failed to materialize.

The country's 100,000 students fear the entire academic year will be lost.

Throughout the country last Tuesday, students burned tires and played havoc with the campus phone and computer systems.

In Beersheba, students briefly imprisoned the rector of the Ben-Gurion University of the Negev.

Teachers have already been promised a 40 per cent pay increase.

But the complicated negotiations, which pit the university teachers and the government against the heads of the universities remain stuck on the details.

Deportation Proceedings Start

DENVER — The U.S. Justice Department last week began proceedings to deport a Colorado resident who was an armed Nazi concentration camp guard in France during World War II.

Peter Mueller, 70, a resident of Boulder, Col., has admitted to having been a member of the Waffen-SS Death's Head Battalion from March 1943 until at least the summer of 1944.

Deportation proceedings against Mueller were opened last week at the Immigration Court here.

Arrests in Anti-Semitic Spree

KANSAS CITY — Police in Overland Park, a Kansas City suburb, last week arrested three youths for a spree of anti-Semitic vandalism that has held this city's 20,000-member Jewish community in fear for the past two months, and which brought the FBI into the investigation. The acts of vandalism included spray-painting graffiti at two synagogues and a shopping mall, and planting a Molotov cocktail, which did not explode, at the local Chabad House.

Meanwhile, a local group of young Jews has formed a Jewish Brotherhood, whose purpose is to fight anti-Semitic acts head-on.

Anti-Jewish Remarks

BUDAPEST — For the first time since World War II, a member of the Hungarian Parliament has openly made anti-Semitic remarks in that body.

During a speech last week to the legislature, Gyula Zacsek, a member of Parliament representing a small right-wing party, criticized the involvement of an Israeli firm in the privatization of a Hungarian supermarket chain.

According to Zacsek, the Israeli firm bought its shares in the Hungarian company for a lower price than was expected.

Zacsek — employing the anti-Semitic rhetoric often used by Istvan Csurka, the leader of far-right elements in Parliament — said the deal was an example of the "Zionist plot" against Hungarians.

He called the Jewish Agency's activities in Hungary "illegal."

Hungarian media noted that neither the speaker of Parliament nor any members attempted to interrupt Zacsek's speech.

Australian Intermarriage Examined

SYDNEY, Australia — A study of Australian Jews reveals that intermarriage remains far below that of American Jews.

The report, conducted by a New South Wales University doctoral student, compared the rate of 13.1 percent intermarriage with that of the United States, where more than half the Jews wed since 1985 have married non-Jews.

The favorable figure for the Australian Jewish community was also compared to that for other Australian groups.

Anglicans married out at a rate of 34.7 percent, and Australian Catholics had a rate of 29.9 percent.

Touvier goes on trial in France for crimes against humanity

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

VERSAILLES, France — Four hundred policemen and elite forces surrounded the Versailles courtroom where the first trial of a French citizen indicted for crimes against humanity began last Thursday.

Police marksmen were visible on the roofs of the Versailles Court of Justice. More than 100 journalists from around the world packed the courtroom where Paul Touvier, after years of hiding from the authorities, is on trial before three judges.

Touvier, the 79-year-old former head of intelligence for the Milice, the pro-Nazi French militia in German-occupied Lyons walked with apparent difficulty. He has prostate cancer.

Only 15 seats were made available to the public, and they were occupied mainly by relatives of Touvier's victims.

On June 29, 1944, Touvier personally picked seven Jewish hostages and had them executed in retaliation for the assassination the previous day of Philippe Henriot, the propaganda minister of the Vichy regime.

Touvier was condemned to death twice in 1946 and 1947 for war crimes, but he managed to elude French authorities. He subsequently took shelter in various French convents and monasteries until President Georges Pompidou pardoned him in November 1972.

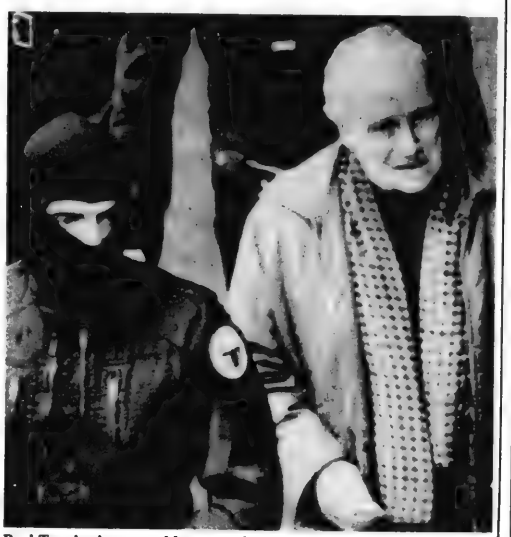
Touvier emerged from hiding, but Jewish and French veterans groups initiated charges against him of crimes against humanity, a charge that is not subject to the statute of limitations and for which pardons do not apply.

Touvier went into hiding again. He was arrested after he was discovered in May 1989 hiding in a monastery near Nice.

Part of the first day of Touvier's trial was devoted to jury selection. Once the nine members of the jury were chosen, Touvier's lawyer, Jacques Tremolet de Villers, argued that the court should disqualify all but one of the 34 "civilian parties," representing families of the victims, associations of families of Jewish deportees and Resistance fighters, and human rights groups, who have also laid charges against Touvier.

He claimed the 30-year statute of limitations on such charges had expired. But the judges ruled that international treaties on crimes against humanity supersede national laws.

Jewish groups tried to demonstrate outside the courtroom, but they were kept at bay by the police.



Paul Touvier is escorted by a member of a elite squad (masked to prevent identification) during a 1990 re-enactment of his alleged crimes during World War II. The re-enactment was part of the lengthy process of bringing Touvier to trial in France. [RNS photo/Reuters]

French Nazi-hunter Serge Klarsfeld's organization, the Sons and Daughters of Jews Deported from France, displayed banners that included the response from General Charles de Gaulle to a request for a pardon for Touvier:

"Touvier? Twelve bullets!" (A firing squad has 12 members).

(DeGaulle led the French Resistance movement in World War II and later was president of France.)

In a recent French poll, more than 64 per cent of those questioned supported bringing Touvier to trial, saying it would help shed light on this dark period of French history.

Murder suspect dies in jail

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Just over a week before she was supposed to have been extradited to the United States to stand trial in connection with a murder, imprisoned U.S. immigrant Rochelle Manning died suddenly last Friday from what is believed to have been a heart attack.

Manning, who was 54, had been unsuccessfully fighting extradition to the United States, where her husband, Robert, was convicted in connection with the 1980 murder of a California secretary by a booby-trapped parcel addressed to her employer.

The Mannings' fingerprints were found on the parcel and instruction sheet.

Robert Manning, 43, was convicted in a California court in October and is serving a life sentence in prison.

Rochelle Manning collapsed Friday morning an hour after roll call. Although suicide was discussed and ruled out, a post-mortem investigation was to be conducted.

Her daughter told journalists that her mother was a strong-willed woman who would not have committed suicide.

The Mannings, who had been followers of the late Rabbi Meir Kahane and early members of his Jewish Defence League, lived in Kiryat Arba after they made aliyah 10 years ago.

Rochelle Manning, who had been in the Neve Tirza jail for the past three years, fought her extradition, saying she believed she would not be permitted to wear modest garments and head coverings in an American prison, in accordance with her Orthodox religious beliefs.

Earlier this year, she lost her final appeal to Israel's high court, after the U.S. Justice Department gave assurances to Israeli authorities that her religious needs would be met. But in a special gesture, her extradition was deferred until after Passover.

After the Friday morning roll call, Manning said her morning prayers and talked to her 20-year-old daughter on the telephone. Shortly thereafter, she collapsed and was rushed to the prison hospital, where doctors worked unsuccessfully for 40 minutes to revive her.

Rochelle Manning belonged to one of the most extreme right-wing elements in Kiryat Arba. Neve Tirza prisoners said she had deeply mourned the death of her fellow Kiryat Arba resident, Baruch Goldstein, who murdered at least 30 Muslim worshipers in the Tomb of Machpelah in Hebron on Feb. 25.

By RABBI AARON LEVINE

The word "Haggadah," which we use for our seder booklet, is based on the verse, "Vehigadta levincha" — and you shall tell your son on that day (Exodus 13:8). Thus one of the main lessons of the Pesach experience and particularly the seder night is the important mandate thrust upon every Jewish parent, "tell and teach your child what our religion is all about." In fact we refer many times in our mitzvah observances to the phrase, "zecher liyetzias Mitzrayim — in remembrance of the Exodus from Egypt." It therefore follows that this all important mitzvah of teaching our children Torah and mitzvot is in reality one of the very reasons and purposes of the Exodus. As the Ten Commandments themselves begin: "I am the Lord your God Who took you out from the land of Egypt . . ." and then follow the commandments which, as our sages tell us, are really the major categories which encompass the entire 613 mitzvot.

We are all familiar with the four sons of the Haggadah. The wicked one says: "For what purpose is all this work to you?" (Exodus 12:26). The idea is that the "rasha" (wicked son) is scoffing and mocking at all of the Torah. It is antiquated; it is ritualistic; it's not relevant; it's burdensome. Why do we need all of this?

Judaism has never discouraged questioning. But the questions have to come from a mind that is genuinely seeking the truth, that starts with the premise that there is much that I don't know, that if great minds throughout the ages dedicated their lives to understanding the Torah, then there must be much that it can teach me.

The great Chofetz Chaim once offered the following parable:

There was a rich gentleman, a diamond dealer, who returned home from his business dealings. He had traveled a long way and was exhausted from the trip. He alighted from the coach in which he left his possessions, went into his house and asked his servant to please retrieve his valise. The man, a new servant, who was unfamiliar with his master's dealings came back huffing and puffing, the sweat pouring from his brow. It was quite obvious this was due to the great weight of the valise which he had lugged from the coach. Said his master to him, "If you are exhausted of carrying my valise then you obviously took another passenger's case from the coach. My valise was a small leather bag containing small diamonds. That's all I was carrying. It weighs very little and shouldn't have caused you any exertion."

Says the Chofetz Chaim: If we find Torah, mitzvot, Yiddishkeit in general, to be a burden; if we ask, "who needs this and what is it all about?" then it's obvious that we have picked up the wrong baggage. To the non-shomer Shabbos Jew (one who does not keep the laws of the Sabbath), Shabbos seems like such a burden. He can't imagine how one can survive the Shabbos; he certainly can't imagine how Shabbos can be the pleasure and delight that it is supposed to be. But ask any Shabbos observant Jew, and he will tell you, "thank God for Shabbos — I couldn't exist without it."

If we are to be able to pass on the lesson to our children, it behoves the parents to study the Torah and have the answers ready when their children ask the questions. At the very least, if they are unable to do this, then they are obligated to entrust their children to schools and Yeshivahs that can do the job on their behalf.

Rabbi Shimon Apiadorf created for the uninitiated, The Passover Survival Kit. If you find the seder boring and difficult to get through, it might be a good idea to start with this — I'm sure the book is available in all bookstores. Reading it carefully will hopefully prod the reader to take a long hard look at what Judaism is all about. It will urge us to find the answers to where do I come from? Where am I now? And where am I headed?

Perhaps those are good questions that even seasoned veterans of Jewish knowledge should ask themselves! Chag Somayach .

Bill paves the way for Shas to return to governing coalition

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The Knesset last week approved a bill banning the importation of non-kosher meat and seafood, thereby clearing the way for the Orthodox Shas party to return to the governing coalition.

In marathon sessions before the Knesset recessed for Passover, Israeli legislators finally voted their approval of the ban in the early hours of last Wednesday.

Shas officials had been calling for the enactment of the legislation as a precondition for its return to the coalition. Shas left the coalition in the fall when its political leader, former Interior Minister Aryeh Deri, was indicted on charges of bribery, fraud and breach of public trust.

The return of Shas to the coalition is significant because it assures Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin of a parliamentary majority of 62 Knesset members. When Shas left the coalition last year, Rabin had to depend on the support of Arab members of the Knesset for a majority.

The measure passed the Knesset two days after Rabin and Deri initialed a new coalition agreement, which is expected to be ratified shortly by the Labor Party and by Shas spiritual leader and former Chief Rabbi Obadiah Yosef.

The bill ran into some last-minute snags earlier last week, when Shas leaders realized that the proposed legislation only banned the import of non-kosher beef. At their insistence, the bill was amended to bar imports of all non-kosher meat and seafood.

The bill came in the wake of a recent government decision to privatize meat imports. Israeli religious leaders had been concerned that privatization would enable businesses to import non-kosher meat.

In order to ban such imports, the Knesset first had to amend one of the basic laws that serve Israeli society in lieu of a constitution. Under the demands of coalition politics, the Labor Party pushed through the change in Basic Law: Freedom of Occupation to permit restrictions on economic freedom rooted in religious values.

This was a blow to the platform of Labor's left-wing coalition partner, Meretz, which had strongly supported the basic law and advocates the passage of others in order to introduce American-style civil liberties here.

Meretz swallowed the ban on non-kosher meat and even agreed to the shelving of the other proposed basic laws after much deliberation, in order to strengthen the coalition.

No escape from confronting Hebron aftershocks

By YESHAYAHU ANUG

To foresee all the internal and external developments unleashed by the massacre in the mosque is beyond the ability of any observer. All one can do is to look at the situation with all the objectivity one can command, resist wishful thinking or excessive pessimism and see the new circumstances as they are. These days the picture is one of the most complicated in Israel's recent history.

For example: A wave of Arab revenge is expected and one of the most urgent problems now facing the government is not whether, but for how long, to maintain the presence of a handful of Jewish armed zealots and their huge families in Hebron. They insist on living with their 100 children in five little enclaves in the heart of that city, whose 120,000 Arabs are momentarily locked into their houses by a curfew which can not last. The present interlude resembles a ticking device, with an idle bomb-squad positioned around it, waiting for a dismantling order that is not coming or for a miracle that won't happen.

Many members of the government feel that these Jewish fanatics are in extreme physical danger and should be evacuated. There is also vast public support for such an overdue measure, but Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin is not revealing his intentions. Although he too calls Hebron a time-bomb, he quotes the Oslo agreement with the PLO, which stipulates that settlements shall not be removed in the interim autonomy period. This argument is strong — an open agreement could lose its binding character — but a more weighty reason for his inaction is that his parliamentary majority is too fragile at this stage to sustain an internal crisis over the issue, which the rightist opposition will surely be eager to manufacture.

Rabin's attempt to increase his support in the Knesset beyond the return of the not-too-reliable Shas party to the fold, has so far failed. He may try again, after his return from his American visit, in the hope that co-opting another parliamentary group will not strangle the peace process altogether. He knows that inaction in Hebron could ignite bloody confrontations, but also that the forced evacuation of the zealots might require the use of force. Thus the excruciating dilemma of the government is that their choice is between two great risks.

Yeshayahu Anug

While the Jewish presence in Hebron is probably the most targeted objective of Arab vengeance, it is for now the most protected. But Arab revenge may seek other intermediary objectives. The present closure of the territories to Arab movement, the numerous curfews, as well as the huge deployment of security personnel, provide a high degree of prevention of terrorist activity; but no emergency measure can last for long. Thus Israel must be ready not only to foil but also to eventually absorb a measure of terrorist attacks in the territories, in South Lebanon and maybe even within the Green Line itself.

During the first days of its work, the Commission of Inquiry into the events in the mosque has uncovered a number of disturbing details concerning the lack of alertness of the security forces on the tragic Friday morning in February. But not less puzzling was the disclosure of regulations that had so far allegedly restricted the Army from using firepower against Jewish terrorists engaged in armed action against Arabs under any conditions.

The existence of such double standards, while use of firepower against Arab terrorism is not all that controlled, had been suspected and often even recorded by the media. Yet the sensational revelation, by a relatively senior member of the security forces during interrogation by the Commission, has led to the unbearable thought that even an effective military unit in place outside the Mosque would have been powerless against the Jewish mass-murderer. If the testimony of the officer is not convincingly discredited by the authorities, the Commission will eventually have to establish high-level military and political responsibility. This could well produce an institutional earthquake.

A closer look at the various army regulations now being made public in the wake of the officer's statement indicates that the regulations were at best ambiguous, and could indeed have been interpreted by him and by his subordinates as he understood them.

Since the signing of the Oslo and Washington agreements and up to the massacre in Hebron, setbacks in the negotiations were often straightened out in the prevailing "momentum" of the peace process. But the process has now lost so much of its grip on the situation, that even if it resumes after being patched up once more, it will continue to be very vulnerable.

Assuming that Rabin's coalition can somehow master the aftershocks of the massacre, what about Yasser Arafat's willingness and ability to steer himself and his untested PLO towards renewed co-operation? The events in Hebron and the bloody disturbances elsewhere have certainly had a devastating effect on his clout in the territories, but they have also offered him an irresistible opportunity to demand a higher price for the resumption of the peace process. As he is now the only plausible partner to a settlement, there is readiness in Israel to meet him more than half way, but he has asked for more than he can get. The government's internal freedom is restricted not just by objective security considerations but also by political inertia. Add to this — on the international level — the potential complications created by the sudden revival of global Russian activism, which may alter both the hitherto almost flawless co-operation with the United States and the Arab reliance on American mediation alone.

U.S. support for Israel is very much intact and likely to neutralize more harmful Russian initiatives, but it is a new situation that cannot be handled successfully even by the United States, without eliciting from Israel more concessions than could have been expected before Hebron. However, the worst scenario would still be an American disengagement from dealing actively with the thorny Mideastern issue. This is not very likely to happen, but President Bill Clinton's administration has enough on its plate, and its attitude will be probably determined by a cool evaluation of the chances of success.

If negotiations do, after all, resume, their agenda and their pace will have changed considerably compared to the pre-Hebron period. Contrary to the stipulation of the Oslo agreement, which provided for a five-year period in which the structure of the permanent settlements could be gradually worked out and also tested, the Arab side will want to shorten this period. It will also press for earlier clarification of the most controversial issues, such as Jerusalem, frontiers and, above all, the immediate future of the Jewish settlements.

As for the latter, Israel's professed ability to somehow manage the uneasy co-existence of settlers and Arabs in the territories has now, after Hebron, suffered an almost irreversible setback.

Family name not taken lightly by Montefiore

By ABRAHAM RABINOVICH

Old Sir Moses Montefiore made seven arduous journeys last century in his horsedrawn carriage during visits to the Holy Land, the last time at the age of 90, to bring succor to the Jews. But the great benefactor's deeds pale in comparison to a single trip made by Adam Montefiore. A descendant of Sir Moses' nephew, Adam came to the Holy Land four years ago with his family to live.

"It's not easy," he said. "It's a struggle making a living, like it is for anyone else. I have the Montefiore name, but not his money."

Moses Montefiore was childless, but he bequeathed his English estate at Ramsgate and much of his fortune to a favorite nephew, Joseph. Adam is a great-great-grandson of Joseph.

Adam Montefiore took time out recently from the harried life of an immigrant trying to keep his head above water to play the role of quasi-Lord of the Manor at the 20th anniversary celebration of the Mishkenot Sha'ananim guest house in Jerusalem.

It was Moses who had built Mishkenot in 1860, the first building outside the walls of the Old City, using funds from a bequest left by New Orleans merchant Judah Touro.

After delivering some brief remarks at the recent celebration, Montefiore graciously accepted the congratulations of guests at the garden tea party which followed. The Montefiore name definitely had an allure for those attending. He made it clear in private conversation, however, that the evening's role was only a brief flight of fancy.

"Back in Oxfordshire, we had a big house, a view of cornfields and horses, two cars. My wife didn't work. It's very different now."

Since arriving on aliyah in 1989, the Montefiores and their three children have been iving in Ra'anana. They spent their initial months in an absorption centre. Because of shaky real-estate values in England, they have not sold their house there and are making do in Israel on their salaries.

Montefiore's wife, Jill, works for a travel agency. Adam, 35, who had worked in England as an executive with a large beverage company — his expertise was wines — found work as a sales manager with the Carmel Mizrahi winery. After two years, he switched to a winery on the Golan Heights. He works in market development, operating out of an office in Tel Aviv but travelling up to the Golan once or twice a week for formal tasting sessions. "We do blind tasting against the competition." It is, he says, work that he loves.

The Montefiore children — Liam, 17, David, 10, and Rachel, 7 — found immigrating "very tough," Montefiore said. "But they now talk and behave like Israelis."

Aliyah is tough for grownups, too. "You're always a bit of an outsider and life is a struggle financially." The rest of his family is still in England. He has three brothers, two of whom are journalists and the other a land agent.

Why had he come? It is a question he has plainly been asked often before and his initial answer rolls lightly off the tongue. "I'm a bit crazy maybe. Also very Zionistic. I like the people, the food, the customs."

Did his connection to Moses Montefiore play a role? "I didn't come for that reason, but once having come it has made a difference." He ruminates a bit. "It's nice to have one's children brought up in a Jewish country, where it's normal to be Jewish. You don't have to make a special effort."

Moses Montefiore wanted Mishkenot Sha'ananim to lure people out of the overcrowded and unsanitary Jewish Quarter. Mishkenot's success would usher in the building of modern, extramural Jerusalem.

During the early years of the state, the building had largely lain derelict under the guns of Jordanian soldiers on the walls of the Old City. After the Six Day War, Mayor Teddy Kollek and the Jerusalem Foundation decided to convert it into a guest house for visiting artists and scholars whose presence would enhance the cultural life of Jerusalem. Funding was provided by American developer William Levitt, whose contribution to American culture had been the construction of the post-World War II, low-price suburban Levittowns. His contribution to culture in Jerusalem would be more elitist.

About 5,000 guests have passed through Mishkenot in its 20 years, including numerous figures of world rank like Saul Bellow and Marc Chagall.

The 10 charming apartments — which can be subdivided into 20 separate units — offer tranquility, small kitchens and stunning views of the Old City walls and Mount Zion. There is a cozy lobby where guests can mingle, but they can have as much privacy as they choose.

Initially hosting artists free of charge, there is now a charge ranging from $85 to $150 a day, depending on the apartment. All guests must be approved by a selection committee. There are frequent cultural events including lectures and symposia tailored to the interests of the guests. These events are not open to the general public but draw an invited audience of Israelis in parallel spheres.

The family name is not taken lightly by Adam Montefiore and the story of Moses Montefiore has been passed on to his children. "They all know who they are and where they come from. That's very important. We get a lot of naches from the name, but the children also know that [the glory of the name] is reflected on them, that it is not about something I have done myself."

Members of old aristocratic Jewish families in England prefer to holiday in Israel once in a while and send money, he says, not to come on aliyah. "In that way maybe I have done something that other members of the family haven't done."

Israel — the most magical place on earth

By RHONDA LEWIS

I had known for years that I wanted to study in Israel for the third and final year of my undergraduate degree, but when the time came to leave Toronto, I felt unprepared. A year seemed like a long time to be away from friends and family you love, but this was a year I needed, to learn about the land and people of Israel, my heritage and culture — and to simply learn more about myself and what I wanted in life.

In school, I had learned the incredible history of this country and I had studied its foreign policies, decision-making and routines. But none of this prepared me for the reality.

The High Holidays were a very different experience. I did not attend synagogue, as I always have at home, but rather went to the Western Wall to pray. I remember feeling overwhelmed when I thought about exactly where I was standing — touching "the" Wall. I really felt like a part of Jewish history. I was invited to dinner with a gracious family in the Old City who opened doors of Judaism for me that I never knew existed. We discussed the significance of every item on the table, and by the time we finished dinner, I felt like I had just learned an entire haggadah (minus the four cups of wine). I left feeling new excitement about the year that was to come.

I was fortunate enough to have both my parents visit me this year. My father came for my birthday in the fall, and I was proud to show him "my" Jerusalem. My mother arrived in mid-December, in time for the Chanukah celebrations which we attended in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and Eilat. In every hotel, menorahs were lit and Chanukah donuts served to all. It was a very special time for both of us. My father is coming again in May; by then, hopefully, I'll be a certified tour guide!

To anyone thinking of spending any time in Israel — be it a week or a year — I have found it to be the most magical place on Earth. From Metulla on the Lebanese border to Eilat on the Egyptian border, every section of the country has something unique to offer each visitor.

I wake up every day, look outside and smile. Why shouldn't I? Here I am in the Holy Land — the land of my ancestors and my roots. I could not have imagined some of the things I have done or seen — scuba diving in the Sinai and Eilat, rappeling and hiking in the Golan Heights, and more. I am truly thankful for the opportunities I have at my disposal. My Judaism is a more important part of my life now — and I look forward to the four months I have left in Israel, to learning and seeing as much as I possibly can of this spectacular country.

Pesach 5754

After the sightings of the first three stars in the Saturday night sky, Jews all over the world, like synchronous waves in a rising tide, will recite the blessing over the wine: thank the Almighty for bringing us yet again to another seder; and formally usher in the holiday of Pesach 5754.

As all of us know, the seder is a singularly special occasion among Jewish holidays. It overflows with expressions of thanksgiving and song and praise, as do other holidays. But it exceeds "mere" celebration in a way far beyond all other holidays. Indeed, that is its essence.

The seder is the divinely-appointed time of the year for retelling the story of the exodus from Egypt. However, as the late Rav Joseph Soloveitchik pointed out, retelling the story is only part of the purpose of the seder.

"The events of yetziat mitzrayim (the Exodus from Egypt) are not only relevant to us, rather, we are actually re-experiencing history on the night of the seder. It is a current as well as a historical event."

This is clear from the passage in the Haggadah which bids each one of us to look upon ourselves as if we personally had been liberated from Egypt. However, what is equally clear in the Haggadah is the group context for such individual re-experience. While it is true that the soul of the individual must soar to a point in the national past, it must do so through collective experience and collective memory.

The Haggadah sends out a pointed message regarding the importance of national unity. It summons us to come together and to sit together and to speak together. The very first words of telling the story set the tone. "Let all who hunger come and eat. Let all who are in need come and observe the Pesach!" There is no equivocation in the Haggadah's words.

Similarly in the reference to four types of children, the Haggadah emphasizes that each child must be taught according to his or her individual level. None are to be excluded.

A more subtle example of the importance placed by the Haggadah on unity can be adduced in the reference to the discussions among the five distinguished Tannaitic Rabbanim in B'nei Brak which lasted to the early hours of the next morning. The rabbis specifically named-came from very different social and economic backgrounds; poor and wealthy, old and young, priest and the child, or possibly the grandchild, of a convert. And yet, these great scholars and leaders celebrated each other's company.

As we turn to the Haggadah on Saturday night, we will be comforted by the droplets of wine we see permanently stained into its pages. They are markers of many prior Pesachs and partial proofs of an ancient but unbroken affiliation to a religion, a people and a Land. Those wine-stained pages bid us to be a united people. This year, may we also be comforted by evidence of a renewed commitment to follow this bidding.

15 years later

Fifteen years ago, on March 26, 1979, on the White House lawn, Israel and Egypt signed the peace treaty which was the culmination of Egyptian President Anwar al-Sadat's revolutionary visit to Jerusalem in 1977 and the framework Camp David Accords negotiated in 1978. At the signing ceremony, Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin spoke of the historic significance of the moment. He placed the event in both a national and a personal context. His words lend poignancy to the uncertainty over the current state of the peace process:

"Despite the tragedies and disappointment of the past, we must never forsake that vision [of the prophet Isaiah], that human dream, that unshakeable faith.

"Peace is the beauty of life. It is sunshine. It is the smile of a child, the love of a mother, the joy of a father, the togetherness of a family. It is the advancement of man, the victory of a just cause, the triumph of truth. Peace is all of these and more, and more."

Then, addressing his remarks to President Sadat personally, Prime Minister Begin uttered words which echo with urgency today.

"In the face of adversity and hostility you have demonstrated the human value that can change history: civil courage. A great field commander once said that civil courage is sometimes more difficult to show than military courage. You showed both, Mr. President. But now it is time for all of us to show civil courage, in order to proclaim to our peoples and to others: no more war, no more bloodshed, no more bereavement — peace unto you. Shalom, Salaam forever."

One cannot reflect on this anniversary without pausing to consider the irony in the present situation.

Had the Palestinian leadership displayed at that time the civil courage of which Menachem Begin spoke, then March 26, 1994, in all likelihood would have marked the 10th anniversary of some form of Palestinian self-rule and autonomy, if not independence.

And where is that civil courage today?

CAMBODIAN PRINCE VISITS

His Royal Highness Prince Sdech Krom Khun Noradom Sirivudh of Cambodia offered prayers at the Western Wall during his recent visit to Israel. The prince, who is also Cambodia's foreign minister, held talks with President Ezer Weizman and Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, and announced plans to open a Cambodian mission in Tel Aviv. SCHINDLER'S NEIGHBOR

I must correct you on a point of fact in the Feb. 17 issue.

You state that Oskar Schindler did not go back to Germany after the war.

Schindler lived at 25 Nurenburger-Strasse, Regensburg for the entire year of 1946, and, if memory serves, the early part of 1947.

I know as I lived in the next apartment of the seven unit building with my brother for that entire time and once even nursed the Schindler dog "Amanget" back to health with a glass of vodka. (I would not have done that for his namesake, the hated commander in Pleshow!)

Editor's note: Maurice Lucow responds that Schindler's return to Germany was not mentioned in the interview and speech he covered. However, he notes that the Jewish Western Bulletin of Vancouver in their story said Leopold Page met Schindler in Germany in December 1945 and that Schindler, after a failed marriage and several failed businesses, went back to Germany from Argentina, where he had moved immediately after the war.

RELATIVES IN RUSSIA

Reading about a paper given at the Seminar on Jewish Genealogy in Toronto (The CJN July 22, 1993) by Alexander Kronick, president of the Jewish Genealogical Society of Moscow, I contacted the Canadian Jewish Genealogical Society asking whether the Moscow group might be in a position to track down the fate and location of cousins (married names uinknown) last heard from in 1963, and how to initiate such a request.

I am grateful to Morris Reitman of the Toronto society for giving me good advice that led to successful results: volunteer workers of the Moscow group had by December 1994 located the relatives and reported to me, this all being done at modest cost to cover their expenses. These volunteer workers would be happy to provide similar service to others for searches in Russia or the CIS. Contact should be made to: Matthew Chlenov, Klinskaya u1 16-102, Moscow 125475, Russia.

SEEKS MARITIME VETS

I am presently working to put together the only war memorial dedicated to Jewish service men and women from the Maritime provinces who served in World War II. The memorial will be on permanent display in Tiferes Israel Synagogue in Moncton, NB.

I would appreciate hearing from any Jewish personnel from the Maritimes who were on active service. I am seeking details on Maritime personnel who served in all theatres of war, in all branches of the service, to ensure a complete record.

Please write with your information, to Morris Jake, RCAF, P.O. Box 623, Moncton, NB, E1C 8M7.

APPEAL FROM DOWN UNDER

I am seeking the whereabouts of Peter Fritz; he was born in Hungary and most likely resided in Budapest. He apparently emigrated to Canada after World War II. He is my father's first cousin. My father's name was originally Geza Fritz. Peter Fritz's father and my paternal grandfather, Moritz Fritz were brothers.

Peter Fritz was a friend of one Anton Bauer who emigrated to Sydney, Australia. The two friends kept in touch for many years until just a few years ago.

HURRAY FOR NOVEMBER

Re the article by Jack Chisvin, "February — the month dedicated to love" (Feb. 24):

Mr. Chisvin says that November is a month without virtue. I would just like him to know that in our home, November is the most wonderful month of the year as our four children were born in November.

No dark, damp joyless days in the Einstoss household, just a lot of love and happiness.

CAN THERE BE REAL PEACE?

Everybody and his brother has an opinion about what the Israeli government should do with its Jewish settlers in the occupied West Bank and Gaza Strip since the Hebron massacre. The PLO is backing off from the peace talks with Israel; Bedouin Arabs are siding with the PLO; Israeli Arabs are protesting; it's havoc.

Didn't everyone suspect that the peace talks between Israel and the PLO would cause bloodshed? For a person who lived in Israel for almost three years of her life, I certainly did. The Israeli and Arab nations have been enemies for many years. Both are hostile and will not refrain from voicing or acting upon their anger.

However, this does not mean that every Jewish Israeli or Arab is a killer. Both have their extremists as any nation does, and they are capable of committing the kind of terrorism that the world has witnessed since the peace talks began. Whether a pregnant woman is murdered in front of her husband and children, or a mass of people is attacked while praying both are acts of evil.

There is no foolproof solution to the Arab/Israeli conflict. Movements such as Kach, the one that the Hebron Massacre killer, Baruch Goldstein belonged to, want to see the Arabs get out of Israel, either by force or by death. The PLO is a terrorist organization which wants to annihilate the state of Israel, exterminate the Jews. Peace between these two is a contradiction in terms.

The rest of both nations have mixed feelings, but when it comes down to it, does either want to live side by side with its worst enemy? Will every single person accept peace as a truism and never draw a gun to protest it?

What was in Goldstein's mind at Hebron?

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

Much has been written in the general and Jewish media about the massacre at Hebron when a Jewish physician, Dr. Baruch Goldstein, killed a large group of Arabs engaged in prayer. Nothing has been quite the same since then: the peace process is in jeopardy, revenge has taken its toll on a number of fronts — not only against Jews but also against others. The circle of violence is hard to stop.

Thoughtful comments on the dreadful event have been expressed by Israeli and Diaspora Jewish leaders, political analysts and rabbis. There is a strong temptation to say "Enough." In fact, a friend of mine confided: "I was glad to read your article on Hawaii because, after dealing with the terrible news, there was something light, sunny and hopeful. It brightened my day — thank you."

Still, ever since I heard of the massacre (the day after Purim; we were still in Hawaii at the time), it has not let me rest. Here then are some additional thoughts.

Goldstein has been described over and over as "deranged," a "madman," as "someone whose mind snapped." Just what do these terms mean? Where is the dividing line between normalcy and madness? There seems to be no indication that Goldstein was mad in the ordinary sense of the mind. Were the matter brought to court, his defence attorney would probably plead temporary insanity and a jury would have to decide whether such terminology applied in this case.

But no one knows for sure. What drives a man used to prayer and religious living to a thoroughly reprehensible, irreligious act? Did he think that the "Jude" badge he put on his chest would honor those whom it had marked for death?

Rabbi Plaut

I am neither a psychologist nor a psychiatrist, and even if I were both of these I would not really know how Goldstein came to commit multiple murder. I am left with uncomfortable feelings and I want to share them with you.

To begin with, I take it that by all accounts, he had appeared as a normal person within the range of that expression. Rabbi Riskin suggests that the death of Goldstein's dearest friend and of other Jews killed by terror may have been the immediate cause of his act. Probably, likely, but there were other reasons as well.

He had political convictions. He belonged to Kach and therefore subscribed to the idea that Jews could live in peace in Israel only if all Arabs were removed from the country. Therefore the current peace process was a nightmare to him, for it foresees an arrangement whereby Jews and Arabs will live together inside Israel as partners, and Jews in the territories will be a minority, most likely governed not by Israel but by an Arab entity.

Thus to Goldstein, the peace process itself which seemed to march forward despite all obstacles that had been placed in its way, had become a terrible threat. How could it be reversed? I am sure that Goldstein and many others who have opposed it have asked themselves this question. But while everyone else is thinking of political means, Goldstein — already on the fringe of the political spectrum — went one step further. Perhaps he was not deranged at all, but did his terrible deed with full consciousness and, knowing that he would not survive it, left a note affirming his love of Israel.

If so, there was no temporary insanity at all but the end of a process of cogitation which led him to commit this act. He knew (so one might speculate) that he would with one fell stroke derail a process which he thought would lead to the destruction of Israel. Therefore it is no surprise that in some quarters he has been hailed as a hero. Even those who thoroughly disapprove of what he did (so one of them told me) say that objectively speaking their own position has been advanced by his nefarious deed.

And something else. It was Purim time when he shot into the unarmed group of worshippers. Did he visualize himself in terms of the Book of Esther? Most people who listen to the Megillah have never really read the full text carefully, but I am sure Goldstein had. In the ninth chapter we are told that on Purim the Jews killed 500 men in the capital of Shushan and the next day another 300, and that in the provinces they slew 75,000. Commentators carefully call our attention to the fact that they slew their enemies, that is people who had raised their hands against them.

It is possible that Goldstein saw himself as a descendant of those who celebrated the first Purim, as one who prevented others from killing him by killing them first. Of course, the Arabs at prayer were no immediate threat — but, to him, they appeared as a potential danger and that was enough.

And finally, who knows but that he also believed that this was something that God wanted him to do. He had no illusions about his own fate and was ready to lay down his life. He may belong to the many who have walked the pages of history and have killed others while shouting the name of God.

I really know none of the above, but as a footnote to a deed that has shocked us all it might focus on the parameters of real peace. For peace is more than an absence of war, it must proceed from our state of mind.

Hard to say goodbye even after 98 years

By ERICA MEYER RAUZIN

My grandmother, Anne Berney Heineman Beer, was 98 when she passed away last month. No one can complain about a span of that generosity, and her life was good until the last couple of years. Well into her 90s, she remained astute, well informed, independent and optimistic.

She lived in a beautiful, resident-governed, retirement community with many other older people. This facility has a large library; an elegant main dining room; separate apartments for the able-bodied; private studios along a dormitory hallway for those who need some care; and hospital style rooms for those who need lots of help. The establishment offers workshops, concerts, landscape grounds, and a full menu of activities. As such places go, it's the best. But even the nicest place can't compensate for the loss of abilities that comes with great old age, only kindness and spirit can do that.

After she was no longer well enough to spend her winters in Florida with us, I would fly up to visit her two or three times a year. By her mid-90s, my grandmother still thought pretty clearly, but she didn't see very well anymore. On one particular visit, when she was about 65, I also began to worry that she wasn't hearing very well either. Then I discovered she'd put on her hearing aids without batteries (too small for folks with bad eyesight to see), so instead of helping her hear, they had become a pair of perfectly fitted ear plugs.

Once we solved that, we went to sit outside on the patio. Though she saw only shapes and shadows, my grandmother enjoyed the breeze, the aromas, and the company of two of her friends: Martha, who didn't remember very well, and Evelyn, who didn't hear very well, with or without hearing aids.

Erica Meyer Rauzin

Over time, I joined many conversations among the three of them — see no evil, hear no evil, and recall no evil — and I discovered that their chats occurred on three different planes within three separate realities. Any topic worth considering was worth considering six or seven times. Once I got accustomed to this, it had a certain warmth and rhythm.

"Not much breeze, not a twig moving," said Martha.

"What wig?" said Evelyn.

"NO TWIG MOVING," said Martha.

"True, and not a cloud in the sky," said Evelyn.

"Feels like a nice night," said my grandmother. "Maybe tomorrow will be cooler."

"You need a ruler?" said Evelyn.

"COOLER," said my grandmother.

"Sure is. Not much breeze, not a twig moving," said Martha.

On they went. If you had to be very, very old, and slightly infirm, this was the way to do it: sitting in the soft twilight with good friends. And that is what my "Mutti" did, as often as she could, until one morning last month. She had been dreadfully sick in the night, and when morning came, she looked at her nurse, said "Thank you," and died.

I can't imagine what it will be like to live without her; we were best of friends my whole life. But in a way her presence is stronger to me today than it was during the last couple of years, when she was alive, but trapped: she could not see, could barely hear or move, and could not remember anyone except her daughters, my mom and my aunt. I know that wherever she is today, she again knows who I am, because it was so painful for both of us when she forgot me. I hope she still again can peer at my "busy-ness" and shake her head fondly, and mutter in her European voice, "remarkable."

We used to talk on the phone for hours, and I've been talking to her all week, elaborate mental conversations, keeping her close by, imagining what she must have seen in nearly 100 years. She grew up in Germany, a pioneer career woman, a teacher and librarian. When my Grandfather was taken to Buchenwald after Kristallnacht, she marched into Gestapo headquarters bearing his World War I medal, proclaimed that they had accidentally jailed a war hero, and — astoundingly — won his freedom . . . but that was early. With trauma and difficulty, they left Germany and survived. She went from wealth in Mainz to taking in sewing in Charleston, South Carolina, two ordinary lifetimes ago.

Her husband — my grandfather — lay down for a nap one afternoon in his 55th year and never woke up. She became a sorority house mother, a self-sufficient woman at a big university and then worked as a librarian in a small college town. Late in life (she thought it was late; it turned out to be relatively early compared to how much longer her life would be) she remarried. There were good years, and there were the years he spent forgeting and dying. He has already been gone a long time. Small gray, silver-framed photographs of these two men flanked the clock on her desk for decades. In her 90s, she could not see the pictures, but she still knew the faces.

My grandmother was amazed to get to be so old; it seemed impossible to her. Well into her 90s, she still dressed for dinner nightly, watched Washington Week in Review weekly, and enjoyed life all the time, though she dreadfully missed reading. She always had hope, she always learned from everyone and every experience. If I can keep that, I can keep her with me just a little longer. Even after 98 years, it is hard to say goodbye.

Did you ever see a naked turkey trot?

By JACK CHISVIN

In word associations most people are likely to match Pesach with matzah. Not me — to me Pesach is synonymous with wine. My earliest memory of Pesach is that of the whole mishpachah, aunts, uncles and cousins crowded around my grandparents seder table where wine (home-made) was central to the occasion.

The table was set with Elijah's beautiful silver koss (wine goblet) in the centre, at the ends cut crystal wine decanters which arrived with my bubbie from the old country, and at each place setting a sparkling wine glass, all used only this one time in the year. Wine dominated the conversation. Everyone had a differing opinion whether this year's wine was as sweet, as red, as strong, as clear as last year's. It was also an event when the children were permitted to drink. It was the parents' ploy to keep them at the table until they were let loose to search for the afikomen.

The centre point of the seder is the Haggadah — questioning and storytelling of the Exodus. As much as reading the Haggadah, our family seder would not be complete without my zayde retelling his own story — an anecdote about his personal exodus from Russia. You should know that my zayde was not very loquacious, actually he very seldom spoke, he seemed to be shrouded in a cloud of benign silence. But on Pesach, stepping out of character, he would retell this story.

On his arrival from Russia he settled on a homestead eking out a meagre existence by growing vegetables and tending a few animals. In the autumn of his first year on the land, as was his custom, he put up the wine for the coming Pesach. After the grapes fermented, not knowing better, he threw the solids into the turkey pen.

Following a gluttonous feast on the solids, the turkeys were overcome by the residual alcohol and fell asleep. Seeing the turkeys in a prone position, the farmhand thought that they had died so he plucked them. The story ended appropriately, with a question: "Did you ever see a naked turkey trot?" he asked in Yiddish with a trace of a smile as my bubbie served the main course — a turkey.

Jack Chisvin

Wine has always been present in Jewish tradition, mentioned 155 times in the Bible. People of biblical times preferred imbibing wine to water. Most of our knowledge about wine in antiquity comes from Talmudic literature, which records the existence of at least 60 kinds.

Wine provided high energy for Noah and his crew and King Solomon courted the Queen of Sheba with wine. To this day Jewish ritual requires wine: a male child tastes wine for the first time at his brit millah; the first act of togetherness for a married couple, even before consumating their marriage, is to sip wine out of the same cup under the chupah; and how can you have kiddush without wine?

Amongst the many impositions our government makes in our private lives is to dictate what wine we shall drink. But by paying a tithe to the Liquor Control Board and the applicable excise and sales taxes, it is permissible to bring back a case of wine from south of the border. If one is interested in acquiring a variety of half-decent bottles of kosher wine, it becomes a worthwhile exercise, not so much because of the money saved, but because of the far greater choice available.

When it comes to buying automobiles my friend Marty and I don't see eye to eye, but when it comes to buying wine, we are of one mind. Early one December, in anticipation of a long cold winter, together with our sleep-in wine mavens, we took a trip to Buffalo to replenish our cellars. One favorite wine store is huge, containing a selection of the best kosher wines from all over the world. We agreed to concentrate on particular French vintage wines to be drunk at festive tasting soirees during the course of the approaching winter.

As if by instinct we both homed in on a well-aged Burgundy. After studying the label, a part of the mystique of wine-buying, we independently concluded it was a "buy." To our regret we learned that this was the only bottle available. Short of pistols at dawn, how were we to decide which one of us was to get custody of this treasure? In consultation with our accompanying people we reached a rabbinic decision — we would buy the bottle as co-owners and not trusting each other to take it home for safe keeping, it was ceremoniously opened and consumed in a park on Grand Island overlooking the Niagara River, fifteen minutes after leaving the store.

Oenologists don't need my guidance, but for those who are ready to go beyond the Manischewitz stage, I share our strategy. As we could purchase 12 bottles each (four cases) we bought an equal number of whites and reds, split between Burgundies (stout bottle with sloping shoulders) and Bordeaux (slim bottle with high shoulders), some for current consumption at our wine tasting evenings, and some to lay down for further aging.

Impressing others by seeming to know something about wine has become fashionable. For a cursory education you can read Winetasters Secrets by Andrew Sharp; or for a more in-depth study The Encyclopedia of Wine by Alex Lichines; or for mere fun The Official Guide to Wine Snobbery by Leonard S. Bernstein. But the best way to enjoy and learn about wine is to drink it.

It is not to be construed that France is the only country capable of producing good kosher wines — many other countries around the world including Italy, Spain and the United States produce excellent wines, some of which were released by Vintages (the fine beverages division of the LCBO), in time for Pesach, and Israeli wines from the Golan are superb. We read in Ecclesiastes, "A feast is made for laughter and wine maketh merry." A dry Reisling can add a touch of class to gefilte fish and while not turning flanken into prime rib, a robust Cabernet Sauvignon can help one pretend.

Omar Khayyam wrote that friends and wine should be chosen with equal care. Drinking wine is an experience in good living. Medical evidence suggests that wine, unlike other enjoyable things, is good for your health. But not everyone would agree, as for example the author who wrote:

Wine is a bad thing:
It makes you quarrel with your neighbor;
It makes you shoot at your landlord;
It makes you miss him.

Gila Almagor never wastes time

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

"I don't stop working, thank God," said Gila Almagor, arguably Israel's best-known actress.

Having appeared in more Israeli films than anyone else, she is indeed a busy lady.

In the past year, she has starred in two movies and in one TV drama on the Holocaust shot on location in Poland. In addition, she hosted an AIDS benefit in Tel Aviv.

How does she manage? "I never waste time," said the trim, black-clad thespian, who was in Toronto fairly recently as a guest of the first Israeli Film Festival. "Time is precious."

In a career which began when she was just 17, Almagor has made the most of her years.

On stage, she has portrayed a variegated array of characters, including Anne Frank, Peter Pan, Maggie in Arthur Miller's After the Fall and Masha in Anton Chekhov's The Three Sisters.

A versatile actress of considerable range, she has performed in Israel's best theatres — Habima, Cameri and Bimot.

A towering figure in Israeli cinema, Almagor has starred in more than 40 films, from Siege and The House on Shlush Street to Salah Shabati and Life According to Agfa.

Critics generally agree that her most distinguished film is The Summer of Aviya, directed by her friend, Eli Cohen.

Based on her best-selling book, The Summer of Aviya is semi-autobiographical, and turns on one summer vacation a perceptive 10-year-old girl spends with her mother, a mentally-disturbed Holocaust survivor. Almagor, a co-producer, plays Henya, the mother.

Although it cost next to nothing by North American standards, merely $370,000 (U.S.), it turned a tidy profit, quite rare for an Israeli film. Still more gratifyingly, it generated an enormously positive response from the media and won awards at festivals in Germany, Italy, Spain, Holland and, of course, Israel. No Israeli film, before or since, has been so acclaimed abroad.

It's not a coincidence that, in The Summer of Aviya, she depicts her mother. "I mothered my mother," she explained. "It was a case of reversed roles."

Almagor, who is married to noted theatrical producer Yaacov Agmon, was born in Petah Tikvah in 1939, just after the death of her 25-year-old father. An emigre from Nazi Germany, he was killed by an Arab sniper's bullet.

Almagor's mother, a Polish Jew who somehow made her way to Palestine on the eve of World War II, lost her entire family in the Holocaust. "She never forgave herself for having survived. She never recovered from the guilt. She had psychotic trips. She was sure she was somewhere in the woods, or in a concentration camp."

Her mother spent the last 28 years of her life in a mental asylum, and Almagor was deeply marked by her descent into insanity.

"You know, I see myself as a Holocaust survivor," she said in an interview at the Park Plaza Hotel. "I was born in Israel. But my generation was a victim of the times. The nightmares of our parents were our nightmares. We sucked the Holocaust with our milk. It was in the air, but it was a hush-hush subject."

In the 1950s, when she was growing up in the new Jewish state, the Holocaust, more often than not, was swept under the rug. "There was a tendency to erase the past, to say what happened, happened, let's put our energy into building a strong, healthy Israel. The subtext was: no more sheep to the slaughter. This all changed with the Eichmann trial, which glued the country to the radio.

"Now, of course, every child knows about the Shoah. Now we read a lot about it, though we still don't understand it."

Because the Holocaust is such a central event in Jewish history, Almagor practically weaned her 19-year-old daughter and only child, Hagar, on it. "I forced her to read books and watch films. But I haven't been able to convince her to see the concentration camps."

Almagor, who herself has yet to make the circuit of the camps, plans to do so when she travels to Poland.

Almagor wrote The Summer of Aviya in 1987, during a crisis. "I was in a bad personal situation and I was beginning to crack up. In order not to lose my sanity, I began to write. I had never written a line before. I wrote it for myself. I never dreamed anyone would read it."

The book, as well as the play, received rave reviews. Now into its 15th Hebrew edition, The Summer of Aviya has been translated into nine languages, including Russian, Danish and French. "In France, it's one of the top ten books for young readers in libraries," she said with maternal pride.

Almagor travelled around the world staging The Summer of Aviya, and all together, she appeared in 600 performances of the play.

The film version, she said, has been a watershed in her professional life, having opened "many gates." Among other things, she has been invited to sit on international film festival juries.

Emboldened by the success of The Summer of Aviya, Almagor has written her second book, which is also semi-autobiographical and deals with the aftereffects of the Holocaust.

Published in Israel in April 1992 under the title of Etz Hadumim Tafus, it garnered rave reviews. English and German editions are planned.

Despite her stature as an actress, Hollywood has never beckoned. When she was much younger, she got a tempting offer from an agent in Paris, but didn't go because she preferred to live in Israel.

Like Edith Piaf, she has no regrets. "You can do in a tiny, little country so much!" she declared. "In a way, Israel is a country of endless possibilities."

In her opinion, Israeli films have undergone considerable improvement in the last few years. "We have a film school in Israel and a faculty of cinema at Tel Aviv University. And today, the government realizes that film is an art form and needs — and deserves — financial support."

But the industry is not as well developed as it could be. "We have good technicians and good actors. But we have a problem with the quality of our scripts."

Like most Israelis, Almagor is politically involved.

A peacenik, she sympathized with Peace Now's positions long before they were effectively adopted by the current Israeli government.

She's optimistic about the prospects for a comprehensive Arab-Israeli peace settlement. "But I'm realistic," she added. "It'll take time and they'll be bumps along the way. We tried wars. Now we must give peace a chance."

Mideast Analysis

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

When the deranged Israeli settler Baruch Goldstein opened fire on Muslim worshippers in Hebron's Cave of the Patriarchs on Feb. 25, he was animated by two broad objectives.

He would exact revenge for the murders of fellow settlers who had been gunned down by Palestinian extremists.

He would deal the peace process, as exemplified by last September's Israel-PLO agreement on limited Palestinian autonomy, a death blow.

That Goldstein — a leader of the lunatic fringe Kach movement — succeeded in avenging the deaths of Israelis who have been wantonly killed by Palestinians is beyond doubt. By mowing down about 30 Palestinians in cold blood, Goldstein set a chilling new standard for irrational behavior and achieved historic notoriety.

And although the unprecedented massacre prompted the PLO, as well as Syria, Lebanon and Jordan, to suspend peace talks with Israel, the negotiations are bound to be resumed sooner rather than later because a diplomatic resolution of the debilitating Arab-Israeli conflict is in everyone's long-range interest.

Neither one man, nor one despicable misdeed, can stop the tide of history.

If anything, the slaughter in Hebron is likely to strenghten the hand of liberal ministers in the Israeli cabinet and harden public opinion against the settlers, who as a group vehemently oppose the Declaration of Principles embodying Israel's accord with the PLO.

Even before Goldstein's rampage, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, who has taken a leading role in promoting a rapprochement with the Palestinians, pointedly questioned "the logic" of maintaining small, isolated settlements in the seething Gaza Strip, which is to be given up in any case.

Goldstein's massacre has backfired

In a similar vein, Peres' hardnosed colleague, Economics Minister Shimon Shetreet, suggested that some settlements in densely populated Arab areas of the territories would have to be abandoned as part of the price for peace.

Peres and Shetreet are not loose cannons. To a large degree, they echo the sentiments of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, a cautious politician who has drawn a distinction between vital "security" and dispensable "political" settlements.

Since Goldstein's outrage, this philosophical orientation has been buttressed. For starters, it is reported that seven out of 15 ministers now would be inclined to clear about 450 settlers out of the heart of Hebron, whose previous Jewish community was destroyed in a pogrom in 1929.

In the eyes of these ministers, and of many ordinary Israelis too, the settlers are an unnecessary source of friction with the Arab inhabitants of Hebron, and a high security risk.

More to the point, the bloody event in Hebron may finally have convinced Rabin and his associates that Jewish extremism, which was openly tolerated by the Likud regime, must be drastically curbed, if not eradicated.

Kach — the late Rabbi Meir Kahane's racist party — and its poisonous offshoot, Kahane Chai, have been banned and some of its members disarmed and detained.

And, as Peres indicated last week, Israel is considering further measures to control Jewish extremists.

Certainly, the United States, which has an unmistakable interest in the ultimate success of the still-unimplemented Declaration of Principles, has urged Israel to get tough with radical settlers.

In all likelihood, Rabin will intensify the crackdown on these forces, whose overarching aim is to scuttle the prospects for peace in the Middle East.

Given the threat from Hamas, Rabin has no intention of disarming all the settlers, nor tinkering with the Declaration of Principles' timetable for discussion of the eventual fate of the settlements.

But is seems clear that the Israeli government has finally decided that a showdown with Jewish extremists, which is long overdue, has become compellingly inevitable.

An artist's fascinating life

By CARL ALPERT

Recently, 19 years after his death, Reuben Rubin, one of the giants of Israeli art, was memorialized in Tel Aviv by the naming of a street after him. His widow, Esther, was given a voice in the selection of the street, she told me, but rather than a bustling thoroughfare, she chose a quiet side street where Rubin's "neighbors" are other distinguished personalities from the cultural and artistic life of the city.

Rubin's life makes a fascinating story. Born in Romania into a family of 13 children, he went to Palestine in 1912 at the age of 19, then travelled for 10 years, returning to this country in 1922. Like almost every great artist, he went through several creative periods, but almost from the beginning his talents were widely recognized and appreciated.

This is not the place for an appraisal of his art, but connoisseurs treasure his work, and many of his pieces are to be found in the great museums of the world. "A national monument in his lifetime," one critic wrote of him. In 1949, Prime Minister David Ben Gurion named him Israeli ambassador to Romania, adding another dimension to a distinguished career.

No less interesting is the story of his wife, who today reigns as a queen of social and art life at her homes in Tel Aviv and Caesarea. Not all who visit the Rubin Museum on Bialik Street, the former family home which she gave to the city of Tel Aviv, nor all who attend her soirees, are aware of the quirk of fate which brought her here — an episode in which I played a fleeting, tangential and non-determining role.

The venue was the Bronx, N.Y., and the year 1929. Esther Davis, an 18-year-old graduate of the Evander Childs High School, was an active member of Young Judea. Charming of manner, fluent of speech, and possessed of literary ability, she had thought of studying law, but her parents could not afford to send her to college. She enrolled nights at Hunter. She entered a contest conducted by Young Judea, wrote an essay on What Palestine means to American Jewish Youth, and in reading of that essay at the national Young Judean convention, she won first prize — a three month trip to Palestine.

The S.S. Mauretania carried 600 passengers on that voyage, and among them was Rubin, returning from a triumphant exhibition of his paintings in New York. From the moment of their first meeting there was no doubt of the outcome, though he was twice her age. Until they were married, in the following year, she worked as a secretary for the British Royal Commission. She contracted typhus, and was nursed back to health by Rubin. Her three-month visit was prolonged for 61 years. When her travel agent, Adam Rosen, reminded her that she still had the unused half of the round trip ticket, received as her prize, she replied that she had won an even better prize.

Her parents were shocked. They could accept a Palestinian Jew, but an artist? That was the year Irving Stone had published Lust for Life, and they could think of artists only in terms of a Van Gogh, who would cast out his wife, and slash off his ear. They did not come for the wedding, but when they got to know Rubin, they took him to their bosom.

The Bronx Cinderella quickly became a reigning belle of Tel Aviv society. Her beauty and her warm personality were a social asset to an artist who moved in the circles of the best-known names in the worlds of culture, politics — and finance, too. There were times of struggle and hardship, to be sure, but Rubin's genius was never questioned. Success and world recognition came to him. Esther knew how to guard him against disturbing elements, and to encourage his creativity.

My wife and I sat in her salon in Tel Aviv, decorated, of course, with numerous Rubins, and reviewed some of the memories of the couple's career. Rubin was never identified with one or another of the trends in art; he was a trend-setter. He never joined an artist's village. When Ein Hod was established, Esther told us, Rubin was invited to settle there. He was offered his choice of any of the abandoned Arab buildings, but he refused. "It is not my land," he said, and when they built their own home, later, it was on unoccupied land in Caesarea.

But where did I enter the picture? In 1929, as a young, ambitious member of Young Judea in Boston, I had entered the essay contest, brashly confident that I would win. It came as a shock when I learned that my essay on What Palestine Means to American Jewish Youth had not passed muster, and some Esther Davis, from the Bronx, had won. I could not forgive her at the time.

"The fixed events of fates' remote decrees," as the poet wrote, ordained what was to happen, and provided the proper niche for each of us in life's scheme.

Esther Rubin and I met last year for the first time, 61 years after the fateful essay contest.

MAYOR MEL'S DEPARTMENT

Even though the Shaare Zedek Medical Center is more than a stone's throw from the City of North York, the names of its mayor, Mel Lastman and his wife Marilyn, are well-known there. The Mel and Marilyn Lastman Department of Surgery 'B', on Shaare Zedek's 7th floor, is filled with the latest sophisticated technology. Established in 1981 in honor of the Lastmans, this department continues to evolve as the field of vascular physics and technology expands. Dina Charsernov, a medical technician in the Lastman Unit, has worked in its blood flow laboratory for six years. She is involved in testing veins and arteries in the neck and extremities to diagnose where blockages occur. Born in Russia and making aliya in 1971, Dina is the only medical technician working in Israel to have gone for special training in the United States and to qualify as a vascular technician.

Post reporter says Israel preparing for Palestine state

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel plans to return to its narrow, pre-1967 borders, with a few exceptions, claims a leading Israeli investigative reporter.

Those exceptions are "a few" Jewish neighborhoods in Jerusalem and Samaria, says Steve Rodan of The Jerusalem Post.

The policy is based on Israel's "perception" that there will be a Palestinian state on its doorstep, possibly within the next two years, Rodan told a small group of United Jewish Appeal/Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto staff last week.

Not long after the Declaration of Principles was signed last year, followed by the self-accord signing in Washington, Rodan dropped a bombshell by reporting in the Post that the Labor government had drafted a plan to return to Israel's pre-1967 borders.

The government responded by cancelling its subscription to the newspaper.

Yossi Beilin, Israel's powerful and outspoken deputy foreign minister, still believes that the entire West Bank and Gaza Strip should be ceded to Palestinians, and that a Palestinian state there, in a confederation with Jordan, would pose no military danger to Israel, Rodan said.

While Beilin's boss, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres is said to oppose that plan, it is Beilin who is responsible for drafting the "nuts and bolts" of Israel's strategy on the peace process, Rodan said, adding that Beilin still plans a "full withdrawal" from territories captured in 1967.

The PLO, he said, wants three main things from Israel: a Palestinian state, Jerusalem as its capital, and the right of return for refugees displaced by the 1948 War of Independence.

Beilin has offered the following: a Palestinian state, no right of return and changing Jerusalem's status to accommodate both Arabs and Jews, Rodan said.

And among Arafat's concessions is that he won't call a Palestinian homeland a state.

Both the PLO and Israel are rushing to implement the Gaza/Jericho First plan well before the end of the interim period spelled out in the agreement, Rodan said.

He said both sides are going full steam ahead on the deal, but for different reasons.

PLO leader Yasser Arafat wants the accord implemented sooner rather than later because he fears he may not have power or even live much longer; while Israel's Labor government wants the deal cemented so that the whole Palestinian question will have simmered down by 1996, when the next elections must be held, Rodan stated.

He said Israel's cabinet is split between those who want the plan implemented soon so that the whole peace process does not fall apart, and those who say it's better to wait and risk failure before Gaza and Jericho come under Palestinian rule.

He said Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin would prefer to wait.

Rodan said Jewish settlements in the territories are "a highly sensitive issue." It's the government's hope, he explained, that settlements will "dry up" and that settlers will leave on their own.

Vatican-Israel accord proving beneficial

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Vatican-Israel accord signed this past December has improved Israel's status in the international community, according to the research director of the Foundation for Middle East Studies.

"There has been a significant upgrading of the very tenor of the relationship within the United Nations to the extent that Israel is treated just like everybody else, which is a significant improvement on what has been for the last 40 years or so," said Dr. David Goldberg at a recent Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto panel discussion on The Vatican-Israel Accord: Hope for the Future held at Holy Rosary Church.

Goldberg said that after the Madrid Peace Conference, as the Vatican and Israel were entering the "serious" phase of their dialogue, Asian, African and former Soviet Union countries established political, economic and cultural relations with Israel.

"While Vatican full recognition of Israel was not necessarily the only or the key explanation for this blossoming of Israel on the international stage ... it was certainly an important ingredient in the normalization that Israel has always strived for."

Goldberg said the accord could pave the way for the Vatican to become a mediator in the Middle East peace process despite Article 11 of the accord that states in part, "while maintaining in every case the right to exercise its moral and spiritual teaching office ... [the Holy See] is solemnly committed to remaining a stranger to all merely temporal conflicts, which principle applies specifically to disputed territories and unsettled borders."

The Vatican now has diplomatic relations with both Israel and Jordan, which has a claim to part of Jerusalem, and high-level contacts in the PLO. Goldberg said it could become a major player in the resolution of the Jerusalem issue. The Vatican, he said, no longer calls for the internationalization of the old city and the holy places, but it does not recognize Israel's claims on Jerusalem.

Among factors mitigating against the Vatican's participation in the peace process, according to Goldberg, is the question of the readiness of certain elements of Israeli society, including segments of the Orthodox community and Holocaust survivors and their families, to welcome the Vatican's mediation. He said some Holocaust survivors are opposed to relations with the Vatican "because of perceived Vatican indifference to the plight of European Jewry in World War II."

Goldberg added that the angry reaction from Muslim extremist groups to the signing of the Vatican-Israel accord does not bode well for a Vatican role in the process. He said there has been "a suggestion of a Zionist-Catholic alliance against Muslim culture" in the Arab media.

During the question period, panelist Sister Mary Jo Leddy, co-founder and former editor of Catholic New Times, asked if Article 11 of the accord means the Vatican is "not going to say anything on the Palestinians."

Panelist Bill Dunphy replied the Vatican will not give up its right to comment and make strong representation if someone's rights are being violated. The Vatican does not think it is its place to comment on disputed territories and unsettled borders, said the former principal of St. Michael's College.

Panelist Rabbi Jordan Pearlson, who as a member of the International Jewish Committee of Interreligious Consultation participated in the discussions that led to the Vatican-Israel accord, said the origin of the accord is a New Delhi conference of the Council of Churches that took place after the Holocaust. There, he said, the churches began to investigate "the role in which their own Protestant and associated cultures had been part of creating the mood for dehumanization which led to the Holocaust."

He warned Pope John Paul II would not apologize for "what wasn't done by any of his predecessors. A current pope, he too has rules of the game he must abide by. To apologize publicly for his predecessors would run contrary to the ground rules of the position he holds. He may build from his own position forward and positively."

Jewish educators to hold conference in Winnipeg

WINNIPEG — In his first speech as president of Canadian Jewish Congress, Irving Abella said Jewish continuity was high on the community's list of priorities. That was in May 1992.

When educators from across the country convene in Winnipeg for the seventh National Education Conference at the Westin Hotel, April 16 to 18, the CJC leader's vision will be very much in focus.

Prof. Abella is among those scheduled to address the event, co-sponsored by CJA, the Canadian Zionist Federation, the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education and the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba.

Education and Tradition: Building Blocks to a Jewish Future is the theme and some 300 delegates are expected to attend.

Among the keynote speakers are Jewish continuity expert Clive Lawton, Toronto Board of Jewish Education director Rabbi Irwin Witty, McGill University Professor Jim Torczyner and scholar-in-residence Ana Poupko of Montreal, CZF president Kurt Rothschild and Council of Jewish Federations president George Wasserstein.

Lawton is chief executive of Jewish Continuity, a charitable community development agency in England recently established under the Chief Rabbi. He will address the conference's opening plenary on the elements of Jewish continuity and the role of education.

Rabbi Witty is the immediate past president of the Council for Jewish Education and he has visited Jewish communities in 13 countries in his capacity as a Jewish educator. Poupko is a doctoral candidate at McGill University and currently serves as a consultant for Federation CJA in Montreal.

Torcyzner recently released a comprehensive study on Canadian Jewish demographics. He will talk about the state of Canada's Jewish population and the implications for education.

The conference will officially open Saturday night with a havdalah service and Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration, featuring the musical group Finjan and the Chai Folk Ensemble.

On Sunday evening longtime community leader Sol Kanee, a past president of CJC and Winnipeg resident, will speak at a Congress 75th anniversary reception.

Winnipeg lawyer Rocky Pollack is chair of the conference. Full registration includes GST, conference material, two receptions, two lunches and one dinner for $199. A basic registration without the meals will cost $95. Participants will be offered optional visits of local schools on both Friday, April 15 and Tuesday, April 19.

4 cups strawberries
2 tbsp. finely chopped fresh peppers
3 green onions, thinly sliced
2 large cloves garlic, crushed
2 tbsp. each pareve Passover margarine and olive oil
Salt and white pepper
2 lbs. veal scallopini
½ cup red or white Passover wine
1 tbsp. lime or lemon juice
⅓ cup coarsely chopped fresh coriander (optional)

Hull berries; chop berries into halves or quarters, large berries into eights, to make about 3 cups (750 mL). Set aside. Combine peppers, onions and garlic; set aside.

In a large nonstick frying pan, heat 1 tbsp. (15 ml) each of butter and oil over medium-high heat. Lightly sprinkle with salt and pepper. Cook veal, in batches uncovered, until golden tinged, 1½ to 2 min. per side. Add more margarine and oil as necessary. Remove to large platters, placing in single layer; cover and keep warm.

Add wine to pan, then onion mixture and juices from platter. Cook, stirring to loosen brown bits from bottom of pan, until reduced to about 2 tbsp. (25 mL), 3 to 5 min. Add berries and saute just until heated through but not mushy. Taste and add lime juice if desired. Pour over veal. Sprinkle with coriander if desired. Serves 6.

MUSHROOM PUFF

½ lb. sliced mushrooms
2 tbsp. butter
1½ cups milk
8 oz. grated Passover cheddar cheese

Radio journalist completes documentary on Holocaust

Series consists of five segments

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For Marsha Lederman, 27, her career as a radio journalist and her family history as a child of Holocaust survivors are intertwined.

"It's a fundamental part of why I became a journalist — looking at the injustices that happened to my parents and wanting in some tiny way to prevent injustices from happening again," she told The CJN in a recent interview. "If I can get on the air and talk about Bosnia, even for 15 seconds, maybe I can make some people think; maybe I can make some people angry."

Lederman recently completed a five-part documentary entitled Hate and Heroism: The Holocaust 50 Years Later that gave her much food for thought on a personal level.

The series, consisting of five seven-to-ten-minute segments (on Survivors, Christian Rescuers of Jews, Holocaust Denial, Education, and the Legacy of the Holocaust), is scheduled to air this week on AM radio station 640. It can be heard at 10:50 a.m. each day, as part of the show Toronto Talks with Bill Carroll. Friday's segment will be followed by an open-line discussion featuring Lederman and one of the Holocaust survivors she interviewed. Aptly, Monday was named International Day for the Elimination of Racism.

Marsha Lederman

Lederman interviewed more than a dozen people for the series, among them Ilona Kuphal, the daughter of an SS officer. Kuphal, who now lives in Boston, founded People Helping People Face to Face, a group for children of survivors and children of Nazis. "As a German I have a responsibility to help heal some of the wounds, to make sure it never happens again, and to never forget," Kuphal had told Lederman.

"I have to deal with losing [many] relatives," Lederman says. "[Kuphal] has that too [having disassociated herself from her family], plus she felt guilty for years for what her father and her people had done. [She has since come to terms with her past.] That interview really opened my eyes."

Lederman, whose mother was in a number of concentration camps including Auschwitz, found the thought of interviewing Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel unpleasant, but says she "couldn't do a piece on Holocaust denial without going to the source."

She credits AM 640 news director Dave Trafford and director of talk programming Bill Carroll for the encouragement they gave her and the enthusiasm they showed for her documentary. Her colleagues at the station, none of whom are Jewish, were also supportive, she said.

The station, aimed at a young, "hip" audience, switched to a partial talk format last September. Lederman has worked for the station and its FM affiliate, Q107, for the past year as a reporter.

Previously she was a news anchor on Hamilton's K-Lite FM/Oldies 1150. An alumna of William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute, Lederman graduated from Ryerson Polytechnical Institute (now Ryerson Polytechnic University) in 1988 with a Bachelor of Applied Arts in Radio and Television Arts.

Lederman played a multi-faceted role in the production of her Holocaust series, serving as writer, researcher, interviewer, editor and producer. She also suggested the idea.

The series will be repeated the week of April 18 on Touchtone, which runs from 1 to 2:30 p.m. on AM 640.

Pancer maintained low profile to keep Canadian team on track

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Phil Pancer recently returned from a memorable two-week stint in Lillehammer, Norway, as part of the Canadian contingent at the Olympic Winter Games.

If you were watching the games on television or checking the results in your daily newspapers, chances are you didn't see Pancer's name listed alongside those of Elvis Stojko, Miriam Bedard or Paul Kariya.

Pancer's job with the Canadian team wasn't what you'd call high profile. Rather, it took place behind the scenes and like the gears and pistons under the hood of a car, it was essential to the smooth operation of the vehicle.

Pancer, scion of the smoked meat family, was part of an advanced "staging and planning team" of the Canadian Olympic Association (COA). They prepared for the athletes' arrival at a staging area in Oslo. It's the kind of job that's taken for granted and only noticed when something goes wrong.

Pancer, whose formal title was reception officer, was in Norway from Feb. 1 to 11, returning the day before the Olympics to attend his daughter's birthday. While in Scandanavia, he began his days at 8 a.m. with the advanced team meeting to see which athletes were expected to arrive that day.

On arrival, the athletes were brought to a conference centre and briefed on a number of fronts. They were given ID cards and accreditation, as well as passports and insurance brochures outlining the coverage provided by the COA. They were briefed on the local currency, the kroner, and given meal tickets for use in the athlete's village. (It probably took a lot of briefings to prepare people for $12 scrambled egg breakfasts and $8 draft.)

Once the athletes were given their ID, they'd be outfitted with the team clothing, such as ski jackets, pants, boots, and of course, toques.

Pancer said each athlete was also briefed on security issues by two RCMP officers and a doctor lectured them about restricted substances, warning them not to take anything, even something as innocuous as Tylenol, without clearing it first with the medical staff.

In addition to participating in the overall organization, Pancer, a photographer by trade, was charged with providing polaroid pictures for athletes' ID, if needed. He estimates he photographed about half the team.

For Pancer, it was photography that provided him with the "in" to the Olympic advance team. A few years ago, while doing team shots for a local hockey team, he was approached by Jim Murray, director of games missions for the COA and a member of the recreational team. He asked if Pancer would be interested in volunteering his services for his country.

Pancer readily agreed and in 1991, he was sent on his first mission to Havana, site of the Pan American Games. He provided the COA with a photo inventory of the athletes and equipment, including the equestrian team's horses.

In July 1992, he was involved in the preparations for the Barcelona Summer Games, though the staging was held in Toronto.

That was followed by the games in Norway. "Norwegian people love Canadians. Whenever they saw Canadian people or staff, they would stop us and wish us good luck. I found the Norwegian people warm and friendly," Pancer said.

A fun part of the trip for Pancer was hanging out with the hockey team for two days before they headed north to Lillehammer. Despite the expectations Canadians usually place on their skaters, the team looked relaxed and full of good spirits, he said.

While in Oslo, Pancer, along with Shirley Kushner, a Montreal-based sports physiotherapist, and Mollie Cartmell, a Peterborough native who headed internal security at the staging area, visited the shul and Jewish Community Centre.

Norway is home to 1,500 Jews, Pancer said, most of whom reside in the capital, Oslo. There's a small community in a picturesque village north of Lillehammer as well.

The Canadian trio spent an hour playing with the kids at the JCC and touring the cheder for pre-schoolers.

Though his role with the Canadian team wasn't major, Pancer considers it "the opportunity of a lifetime." He's already looking forward to 1996 and the Summer Games in Atlanta.

Canadian snowbirds attend Hadassah-WIZO conference

MIAMI BEACH — Close to 300 snowbirds attended the recent Hadassah-WIZO 16th annual Southern Conference held here.

The conference, which focused on the peace process, was designed "to strengthen and confirm [members who winter in Florida] contribution to the State of Israel," said Canadian national president Judy Mandleman.

Those who attended the conference heard from Harriet Kurlander, the Palm Beach director of American Jewish lobby group AIPAC; Ruhama Hermon, consul general of Israel to Florida; Lily Frank, national executive vice-president; and Shirley Croll, outgoing national chair of the Heritage Fund. Croll said the fund has received 400 contributions of $1,000 each out of a goal of 1,000 contributions.

Tribute was paid to Marcia and Clifford Shapiro of Palm Beach, organizers of the Southern Conferences since their beginnings. Mandleman presented them with a sculpture made of British Columbia jade "in appreciation of your magnificent accomplishment of arranging this conference."

Clara Balinsky, honorary national president, paid tribute to the late Yvonne Hardy, a past president of Montreal Hadassah-WIZO, who recently died in Israel two years after making aliyah.

Among the national officers attending were Balinsky, Merle Koven, Carole Pulver and Diana Shadowitz.

Fruit juices out for Pesach

By LORI DENNIS
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Stanmar International, a Canadian food importer and exporter, is bringing the first-ever kosher for Passover tetrapack fruit juices to Canada with the Star-K kashruth certification.

Response among shoppers has been terrific, enthuses Martin Pamensky, part owner of Stanmar, which operates as Protea International when importing and marketing South African products.

"We're very excited about this product," Pamensky said.

Known as Ceres Fruit Juices, the product is made by one of South Africa's leading producers of aseptic, pure fruit juices and is available in over 44 countries around the world.

"Ceres has been touted by all the major chains — Food City, Miracle Mart, SunnyBrook, Highland Farms and Dominion — as one of the most exciting new kosher food products for Passover," says Pamensky. "And if you ask any of the 100,000 South Africans living here about Ceres, they'll know the product without question."

Ceres Fruit Juices, knows for their high vitamin and mineral and low acid content, were sold in Canada between 1982 and 1986, prior to government sanctions against South Africa. Now the product is making a comeback, and will be available at all the major chains and smaller specialty stores, wherever kosher products are sold.

Distributed by Supreme Food, the tetrapacks will be sold in four flavors — mango, peach, guava and medley of fruits — all in one litre packs. After Passover, these flavors will be available in the smaller packs as well.

Stanmar International also imports Debras Schmaltz, made from vegetable preparations of vegetable oils with natural vegetable coloring. It's a healthy alternative to the original schmaltz made from chicken fat, and is available at leading kosher outlets in Toronto.

Small communities growing in number, size

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — From Iqaluit on the eastern edge of Baffin Island in the Northwest Territories to the Lower British Columbia mainland and the Lower Fraser Valley near the United States border, small Jewish communities are growing in number and size.

At a meeting of the small communities division of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) Pacific region, held recently in Vancouver, representatives reported on the successes and concerns of the Jews in their area.

Sheldon Nider, president of the Arctic Jewish Community Association, reported that the decentralization of government offices in Yellowknife has resulted in Jews moving as far north as Iqaluit, and south to Hay River on the southern terminus of the Mackenzie River.

Even in a remote town where the Jewish population is small, racists distributed anti-kosher flyers in a food store in Hay River. The RCMP and CJC were notified and the store management agreed to remove the flyers.

"On the other side of the grocery story," said Nider, who has lived in Yellowknife since 1978, "the Yellowknife Co-op agreed to bring in Passover supplies for Jewish families on special order. The store also bakes 'kosher style' challah every Friday."

Nider said the association is hoping to bring a Holocaust survivor to some northern communities, "depending on the reception of the schools and the availability of a presenter."

He also said the association has a good library and provides resource material about Jewish life to Jews and non-Jews. Frequent requests come from the media in the area and from Jewish families interested in moving north. "We get several queries each year from people interested in conversion, and we give information to schools."

Reporting for the Burquest Jewish Community Association, which serves Jewish communities in the Lower Mainland around Vancouver, Cliff Ungar said his group now has 40 active member-families and the Jewish population is growing rapidly. Many activities take place on a weekly or monthly basis, either in homes or in rented premises and "we feel we are hampered by the lack of a central location to hold our gatherings."

Efforts are underway for Burquest to have its own building. "Our primary need, therefore," Ungar said, "is expertise in the field of fundraising."

He indicated, however, that their immediate need is for a Torah, "and any information as to how we can get one without spending an inordinate amount of dollars (which we do not have) would be invaluable." Also needed are Chumashim, and ceremonial objects such as a kiddush cup, havdalah set and Shabbat candlesticks.

In terms of spiritual leadership, Burquest feels that a rabbi or spiritual leader shared among the small communities "would be a valuable asset in the province."

The Okanagan Jewish Community has made real progress, according to the report given by Gloria Golbey of Kelowna. Jewish schools are running well with three classes — for preschool, primary and intermediate/senior students. Israeli dance classes are being offered on a monthly basis "with the hope of our community being able to perform at the upcoming July 1 Multicultural Day celebration. At the request of the community, the local Safeway store carries a large selection of Passover items. And a second annual bazaar is in the planning.

Golbey concluded, "We are excitedly looking forward to our first Negev Dinner on May 10," at which the local MLA, Cliff Serwa, and his wife Lois will be the honorees.

Marilyn Berger, associate executive director of the CJC Pacific region, reported that the Jewish community of the Lower Fraser Valley (near White Rock, on the United States border), is being organized with Joe Whitman as president. Whitman and another representative attended the Vancouver meeting.

Berger told The CJN that a Western conference is being planned, as part of the celebration of the 75th anniversary of Congress.

Some differences matter more than others when funeral arrangements have to be made

There is a difference but it's not price

Benjamin's has been providing meaningful, dignified funeral services for three generations. The real difference isn't price. It's the lasting value of experience, and the caring personal service every family receives at Benjamin's.

On the other hand, there's usually very little difference in cost between chapels. Regardless. The price for identical products and services may vary slightly, but there's no comparison in quality.

According to families who have experienced it firsthand, these differences mean everything.

This year kids like this will be marching a shorter distance along one direct route in UJA's revamped Community March for Israel.

UJA revamps annual Walk in favor of shorter March

TORONTO — The annual UJA Walk for Israel is getting a face lift this year.

On May 29, the walk will become the Community March for Israel. According to co-chair Judy Engel, it's more than just a cosmetic change.

"There's only one route and it's much shorter so families can march together with enough energy left to enjoy the celebrations at the end."

The March will begin at 10 a.m. sharp at the Promenade Shopping Centre on Bathurst, north of Steeles, and finish at the Jewish Community Centre, about three miles away. Because it's a much more concentrated trek, co-chair Alan Winer expects to see more marchers, many of them first-timers.

"It will allow a lot of different people to participate, such as the elderly who wouldn't have considered it before," he said.

Most importantly, the concept of a March will, according to organizers, offer the Jewish community a symbol of solidarity and unity.

Schools, youth groups and synagogues are being asked to create banners for members to carry.

March proceeds will be sponsoring children in Israeli Youth Aliyah villages, many of whom have recently arrived from the former Soviet Union without their parents.

"We're going to be publicizing a shopping list of services that sponsorship pays for," said Engel. "Children are very fortunate here. We want to teach them to help others."

The March will be followed by a festival in celebration of unity, with live music, a petting zoo, costumed characters, a kosher barbecue and kosher sweet treats.

Religious circumcisions not greatly affected as Ontario de-lists services

TORONTO — The Ontario government's recent decision to de-list routine newborn circumcision from its health insurance plan should have little effect on the Jewish community, a Toronto mohel says.

Dr. Aaron Jesin says the Ontario Health Insurance Plan (OHIP) always has paid, and will continue to pay for circumcisions that are medically required.

"But there's more to a bris than circumcision," Jesin adds.

Brit milot, he points out, are performed by mohalim who are paid a fee.

Recently, OHIP announced that a number of medical procedures will be de-insured in order to trim some $20 million annually from ballooning provincial health care costs.

Included in those procedures are routine newborn circumcision, as well as ritual or cosmetic circumcision at any age.

Before these changes, OHIP paid $31.75 toward the routine circumcision of a newborn, and $82.90 toward the circumcision of a boy over the age of 10 days, according to Health Ministry spokesman Philip Carter.

OHIP, Carter said, will continue to pay for any circumcision a doctor says is needed for medical reasons, regardless of the recipient's age.

Jesin estimates that a routine circumcision for a newborn — not a bris — will now cost about $100.

He said the changes could affect those who want to be circumcised for religious reasons, especially older boys and men who would require hospitalization and treatment.

But Carter indicated the new rule can be bypassed if a doctor says a circumcision is required for medical or health reasons.

Teenagers receive Bell grant for video on physically disabled

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Seven teenage girls, all of them 16 years old and Grade 11 students at York Mills Collegiate, recently received a grant from Bell United Wave to make a half-hour video about physically disabled teens.

Bell United Wave, initiated by United Way of Greater Toronto and sponsored by Bell Canada, awarded Danielle Bader, Laurie Biderman, Jennifer Hennick, Nicole Markowitz, Kaylea Sokalsky, Rachael Swartz and Julie Stevens $240 to make the video through which they hope to help break down the prejudicial barriers between able-bodied teenagers and those with physical disabilities.

Laurie Biderman said the group intends to profile four or five disabled teenagers in the video, highlighting their hobbies, interests and dreams. "I think when the audience watches the video it will help them understand disabilities, but they'll also understand the people and see them as people like themselves."

She added the video will also include people talking about their experiences with prejudice.

Danielle Bader said a lot of teenagers know nothing about people with disabilities and as a result they tend to shy away from them.

The girls will be showing the video to students in junior high and the early years of high school. "I don't think high school [students] will be affected as much. They've already developed their ideas," said Kaylea Sokalsky.

The video, which they plan to distribute to North York schools, will be accompanied by ideas for discussion and projects, as well as an evaluation form. If any schools would like the teenagers to present the video at a school assembly, they said they would be happy to do it.

Laurie Biderman and Nicole Markowitz have both worked at a summer camp where part of the program involves integrating children with special needs. Biderman said she has seen how effective it is to inform young people about someone's disability. "All it takes is a little time to understand their disability. That increases the willingness to accept them."

Sarelle Merkur, a 15-year-old Grade 10 student at York Mills Collegiate, received a $175 grant from Bell United Wave to have an art therapist who helps people with eating disorders come to talk to the students. Merkur became concerned about eating disorders because she noticed how common they are among her friends and classmates. Some friends worked with her on the project by helping her publicize the event.

As well, seven Grade 12 students from York Mills Collegiate are making a video about eating disorders. They got a $210 grant from United Wave for the project. The students, all 17, are Melanie Friedman, Corinne Gelman, Cindy Grossman, Janet Rukusin, Rayna Schnapp, Rebecca Stoller and Tracey Wise.

Their video will include girls who had or currently have eating disorders and doctors who will speak on the subject. They plan to show the video to junior high school students. "We feel that age group is where it starts, before they get into high school," said Rayna Schnapp.

Lisa Becker and Jennifer Pearlman, both 18 and recent graduates of York Mills Collegiate, used their $700 grant from United Wave to give about a hundred York Mills students and members of the community four hours of CPR instruction free of charge on a Saturday early in March. Pearlman said the course usually costs $35 to $50 per person.

They invited six instructors — two police officers, two nurses and two certified CPR instructors — to teach the course. At the end of the course each participant received a certificate.

Becker and Pearlman distributed 1,700 flyers publicizing the course. Some were sent home with report cards and others were posted at local businesses and community centres.

Terrorism in North America expected to rise

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — On March 1 three chassidic Jews were gunned down in Brooklyn by a lone Islamic extremist.

An expert on international terrorism said this shooting was not an isolated incident. He predicted an increase in acts of terrorism against North American Jews.

"The shooting of the three chassidic Jews is the harbinger of things to come," said Steven Emerson, a Washington-based investigative journalist.

He spoke about the threat of Islamic fundamentalism to the West at the Issues and Insight lecture series, sponsored by the New Leadership Divison of the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University.

Emerson said fanatic Islamic fundamentalists are moving to the U.S. because it is easier for them to carry on their activities on democratic soil. He said it was ironic that fundamentalists see the U.S. and other western countries as safe havens, but are bent on destroying them.

"They are rigidly set on a mind-set that the West hates them . . . It justifies a defensive war against the West."

Emerson emphasized that the views of radical fundamentalists are not representative of the majority of Muslims. He said the fundamentalists "are rooted in the past. They want to turn the clock backwards" to the 8th century. They do not accept the division of church and state, and abhor individual rights and freedoms.

The bombing of the New York World Trade Centre last February represents the nihilistic view the fundamentalists have towards their enemies, he said, and the violence could escalate.

"If we don't come to understand [the Islamic fundamentalist mind-set] we'll be confronted by more and more World Trade Centres."

He said the fundamentalists view history as a continuum of a Western conspiracy against them and have construed a string of historical events as proof: the Crusades, the Spanish Inquisition, the Ottoman Empire, the Balfour Declaration, the creation of the state of Israel, the Gulf War and the Hebron Massacre.

According to fundamentalists, these events show the West is "driving the dagger into the heart of Islam . . . The whole existence of Israel is a dagger in the heart of Islam."

He said fundamentalists who have relocated to the U.S. are propagating institutionalized anti-Semitism in that country. "These organizations openly talk about killing Jews."

However, their goal, he said, is to destroy all non-Muslims. "Every day they beg and pray for the destruction of all Jews, for the destruction of all Christians, for the destruction of all infidels."

Protecting the general population against this type of violence in the U.S. presents a big challenge to law enforcement agencies, he said. They have to deal with a new language and culture, comparable to the FBI's handling of the Mafia.

"It took the U.S. 20 years to get a handle on the Mafia. We don't have 20 years."

He went on to say extreme fundamentalists were changing the identity of Islam by glorifying terrorism.

There is the notion of personal jihad — individuals take it upon themselves to commit acts of terrorism in the name of Allah. Emerson said that mentality is becoming more common in the U.S. The shooting of the three chassidic Jews in Brooklyn was not authorized by any fundamentalist group — it was a personal Jihad to avenge the Hebron massacre, he said.

Emerson warns there will be more personal jihads and organized act of terrorism at synagogues and Jewish schools. It could be a matter of "weeks, months or years before the battle is at your doorstep," he said. "Increasingly it's going to threaten national interests.

"You're going to feel it physically."

History viewed as Western conspiracy

Agunot vigil held in Hamilton

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Corresondent

HAMILTON — Although prevented by a fierce winter storm and hazardous driving conditions from taking part in the recent nation-wide vigil in support of agunot, area women did not let the occasion go by without recognition.

On March 13, the day Israeli women were once again petitioning the rabbinate for a means of facilitating the giving of a get, some 50 women and a handful of men gathered at the JCC to voice their support.

No rabbis were present, but guest speaker Ahuva Soifer, a teacher at McMaster University's School of Social Work, had consulted the spiritual leaders of Hamilton's Reform, Conservative and Orthodox congregations.

Despite their differences on how to deal with the problem, she reported "there is uniformity among all our religious leaders on the need to help solve this issue."

Placing the get in the historical context of laws written "many thousands of years ago," under conditions very different from those today, Soifer cautioned that while "Halachah is not written in stone" and changes can be made, they must be made with extraordinary care and only, she said, "by scholars, people exceptionally wise and learned and people who have authority to make such changes."

Meanwhile, she urged all Jewish communities "to insist that a man who refuses a get . . . should not be allowed synagogue membership or synagogue honors, should be ostracized by the community and even, should be picketed."

The short program, which was chaired by Hamilton Na'amat president Simone Rotstein and included welcoming remarks by Hamilton-Wentworth & Area Jewish Federation executive director Patricia Tolkin Eppel, concluded with a brief candlelight vigil.

Canada to play role in BIU's data base on Soviet Union

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Canada will be playing a central role in establishing a special data base on the Soviet Jewry movement at Bar-Ilan University.

The data base is the brainchild of Yitzchak Mayer, who served as Israel's consul general in Montreal during the early '80s and retired recently from diplomacy following a three-year stint as ambassador to Belgium and Luxembourg.

In a recent interview with The CJN, Mayer said the data base will answer the need for a centralized, comprehensive record of the Soviet Jewry movement that scholars and researchers could use.

Canada will probably be the most important contributor because of the significant role it played in the Soviet Jewry struggle, he said.

The data base will collect, classify and document materials from many countries to make the historical record as complete as possible.

"There are two tracks," said Mayer. "The first is to find out really how, within the [former] Soviet Union itself, a 'Jewish rebellion' came to be, after being so closed off as a society.

"The second track will [use the data base to] investigate how, for the first time in modern Jewish history, such a tremendous coalition, under the 'Let My People Go' banner, was born in the Diaspora."

Mayer's affiliation with Bar-Ilan, at age 59, marks something of a departure for the erstwhile ambassador.

His role as "special advisor" to Bar-Ilan is his first since retiring from the diplomatic corps.

"I've now become something like a roving ambassador," says Mayer.

For Mayer, Haifa-based Bar-Ilan is a logical choice for involvement because it shares his world view that it is possible for secular and scientific studies to flourish within an Orthodox milieu.

It is a sensibility that is also very much a relection of Mayer's own upbringing.

Yitzchak Mayer

Born in Antwerp, Mayer said he was raised "all my life" with the Orthodox traditions while striving to be "a full member of the world around us."

The two notions are not only compatible, but essential if Jewry hopes to fend off the forces of religious/secular polarization Mayer sees seeking to prevail.

"This polarization is very, very dangerous," Mayer said. "The idea of universalism is now under siege."

As a Bar-Ilan representative and a former European diplomat, Mayer said he is working to also bring university activities closer to the European Community (EC) as it evolves into an "economic colossus" of over 320 million people.

The university is establishing a department of studies for European languages and will be encouraging possible linkages between the university's research departments and European-based industries.

Scholars from the university and Europeans are also involved in the multilateral levels of Arab-Israeli negotiations on issues like regional ecology and agriculture.

"It's very important," feels Mayer, "to tie Israel to the European reality at all levels."

But the western European reality, he says, also includes includes Arab fundamentalism "percolating" on the continent.

Mayer prefers the term "integrism" to "fundamentalism" because he feels the former term more accurately conveys the movement's "radical nationalism within a mosque."

But Europe will have to balance its xenophonbic tendency to exaggerate the "Arab invasion" with the reality: that rising Arab fundamentalism within Europe is also an issue that has to be faced.

Mayer's recollections as ambassador to Belgium are very much of being Israel's "first visibly Jewish" envoy because he wore a kippah.

"I was very visible as a Jew, and that allowed me to understand how Europe is still crushed by the Holocaust.

"The history of Europe as it is today started in 1993 [with Hitler's rise to power]. It still hasn't come to terms with it."

As ambassador Mayer befriended Belgium's Jewish community of 45,000, centering in Brussels and Antwerp, and found it to be "strongly Zionist." Brussels was the less religiously-oriented centre, but was still committed to education. Antwerp has fewer Jews, but more Jewish schools and synagogues.

Because of Belgium's role in saving Jews during the Holocaust, Mayer launched a "righteous gentiles" project.

He also promoted greater economic and tourism links (Israel has a second EC ambassador in Belgium) and raised Israel's profile at Belgium's universities.

In his memory, however, Montreal remains the "creme de la creme" of Jewish communities because of its "harmony and unity.

"It's very unique in those terms," he said.

Reform Movement Issues Guide

TORONTO — Members of the Reform movement should visit Israel as often as possible, not just as tourists but as relatives seeking to deepen family ties, states a pocket guide issued by the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC).

They should also help to organize and subsidize youth and young adult tours to Israel, encourage volunteers for Israel and those contemplating aliyah, and establish relations between North American Reform congregations and Reform congregations in Israel.

As well, they should subscribe to journals that focus on Israeli affairs, and support cultural and social justice endeavors in Israel, states the new guide prepared by Rabbi Simeon J. Maslin of Reform Congregation Keneseth Israel in Elkins Park, Penn.

In a foreword, Rabbi Alexander M. Schindler, president of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, and Melvin Merians, chair, state: "Because autonomy is the hallmark of Reform, there is a widely held perception that, in the final analysis, nothing is required of the Reform Jew and nothing is forbidden. That simply is not so. As liberal Jews, we can well stand on our right to choose. But we have no right to choose nothing at all or choose something and observe it only haphazardly."

The guide may be ordered for $1 per copy plus 50 cents postage from UAHC Press, 838 Fifth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10021.

Calgary Cantor Re-appointed

CALGARY — Cantor Gary Zener of Beth Tzedec Congregation was recently appointed to a two-year term on the provincial board of the Pastoral Care Association.

Zener, who graduated from the Jewish Theological Seminary's Cantors' Institute in 1983 following his BA in sociology from York University in Toronto, has been helping the sick heal spiritually for years.

"Pastoral care is a crucial element in the healing process, for one's attitude and spiritual being are tremendously important in enhancing overall healing and making one whole again," Zener said.

The Pastoral Care Association of Alberta lobbies government officials and members of the legislature for improving spritual care. It examines issues like palliative care, hospice care, long-term home care and medial ethics in workshops and seminars.

Zener grew up in Toronto and attended Adath Israel Synagogue. He said he was inspired to become a cantor by Cantor Eliezer Kirshblum.

Who Speaks for Canadian Jewry?

TORONTO — Who Speaks for Canadian Jewry was the subject of a recent address by B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) executive vice-president Frank Dimant, who spoke to approximately 20 people at a brotherhood breakfast held at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

While Dimant praised the work of volunteers and professionals in organizations such as Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), the Council of Jewish Federations, the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, and the Canadian Zionist Federation, he charged that Canadian Jewish life is "lacking in the democratization process." He said that the Jewish community does not seek input and noted a "crossover" of leadership and membership among a number of Jewish organizations.

When asked about the difference in mandate between BBC and CJC, Dimant stated that BBC doesn't "profess to speak for the total Jewish community. We speak for our membership base. We do not accept the concept of a parliament of Canadian Jewry...[They are] two different organizations equal in terms of what they should be doing, and, I think, deserving of the respect of the community in equal measure."

Synagogue Makes Decision

VICTORIA — Congregation Emanu-El here has adopted a policy of full synagogue participation by males and females in all areas of synagogue life. This was approved by 86 per cent of the membership at a recent general meeting, following several earlier meetings at which the matter was discussed.

In recent years, the synagogue has held egalitarian services in which women participated, every two weeks — sometimes more often.

April Katz, president of the congregation, told The CJN there had been considerable uncertainty as to the impact on members of the new policy, particularly in view of the fact that Emanu-El is the only synagogue in the city. That is why several meetings were held so as many members as possible could voice their views. "It was determined," Katz said, "that the great majority of members will be comfortable with the situation."

Toronto nurse finds Israel experience challenging

TORONTO — Debrah Laffin doesn't mince words when describing the new Comprehensive Heart Institute at Shaare Zedek Medical Centre in Israel.

"This is going to be gorgeous! I don't know of any place in the world like this. I wanted to put it in a box, tie a ribbon on it and take it home with me!"

Laffin, a cardiac surgery nurse at Toronto's Sunnybrook Health Science Centre, spent six weeks in Israel this winter training nurses in advanced cardiothoracic surgical techniques.

The Heart Institute is scheduled to open in mid-May.

Laffin befriended a Shaare Zedek heart surgeon when he spent last year as a fellow at Sunnybrook. She had never been to Israel before.

Laffin has been a cardiac surgery nurse at Sunnybrook for six years. Prior to that she was on staff at St, Michael's Hospital in Toronto and the London University Hospital in London, Ont. She started as a ward nurse, but preferred the operating room.

"I find it fascinating that you can stop the heart, work on it and then start it up again," she said. "No matter how many I work on, each one is fascinating."

Sitting in her comfortable Toronto living room, Laffin spoke warmly of the land and people of Israel. As a Christian, she was especially impressed by the devotion of the Chassidim and the strong sense of Jewish identity expressed by all the Jews she met, regardless of affiliation.

She also noted that, since Israel's population is composed of people from around the world, she "didn't stand out like a sore thumb" as she had feared and was even mistaken for an Israeli.

"The fact that I didn't know Hebrew was limiting, even though almost everyone at the hospital speaks English," she admitted. "It was truly challenging that I couldn't do something as simple as go to the fridge and get a bag of blood, because I couldn't read the labels, or couldn't understand the notices. It's a very humbling experience.

"You tend to take for granted how easy it is to communicate when you speak the language. I now have true respect for people who came here to Canada without knowing any English and who have made it. I also appreciate what it is to be illiterate."

At Shaare Zedek she worked with the new charge nurse for the cardiac surgery unit and with nurses in the temporary surgical theatre.

One nurse was a recent immigrant from Russia, who had worked in cardiac surgery before coming to Israel.

"I don't know how the patients survive," she said. "There are no by-pass machines in Russia. The patients are made very cold and then are operated on. The nurses have to work very fast and she does."

Laffin suggested improvements for the existing operation theatre, and helped pick floor tiles for the new one. "When you perform surgery, you count everything — sutures, needles, etc., — and you often find some on the floor. Some of these things are tiny and you have to be able to find them quickly and easily. If they blend in with the pattern of the tiles, you have to crawl around on your hands and knees to pick them up." The contractor went off to select new samples.

"Israel truly opened my eyes to a lot of things," she said. "North Americans are generally very ignorant as to what's going on there. Other than the fact that you can see soldiers on the street all the time, it doesn't look that different from Toronto.

"I find the people fascinating. They appreciate and love their country and are more than willing to take you anywhere and everywhere to show it off. The mixture of Arabs and Jews is to be seen. This is so weird — they're supposed to be at each other's throats, yet they work together and in the hospital there are Arab and Jewish patients being treated together."

Pointing to an album filled with hundreds of photos she took in her spare time, Laffin vowed to return to Isreael as soon as possible and see the Shaare Zedek Comprehensive Heart Institute in action.

Help line launched for caregivers of seniors

NORTH YORK — If you're caring for an elderly relative or friend, you may need help but are too busy to seek it. That's why North York's Public Health Department has launched a help line for caregivers of seniors.

Caregivers can call the Caring for Seniors Line 395-7780 Monday to Friday from 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. to seek advice or support in their efforts to care for an aging friend or relative.

"The line is for anyone trying to help an elderly person. It could be a daughter helping her mother live on her own, a husband trying to care for his wife at home or a friend trying to get good care for a senior already in a nursing home," said nursing manager Bev McClelland.

"Sometimes a caregiver just needs to vent their frustration or their fears," said McClelland.

The average age of most caregivers is 57. Seven out of 10 caregivers are women and an increasing number of caregivers are men.

The demands of caring for an aging relative is responsible for 37 per cent of absenteeism from work, making caregiving as much a concern to employers as employees.

Caregivers may need help getting the right community resources, such as nursing, home care or respite care. North York public health nurses staffing the help line will give advice on what help is available.

The caregivers' line is the second new service for seniors started by North York's Public Health Department recently. In November, the Seniors Peer Counselling line at 395-7720 began taking calls. The line is staffed by senior volunteers trained to help other seniors deal with loneliness, aging or other issues common to their age group. Plans are underway to extend hours of operation from the current three afternoons a week.

Community's future in Quebec discussed

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The threat of Quebec separating could create an outflow of professional, middle-class younger Jews from the province reminiscent of what took place in Morocco after its 1956 independence, a recent seminar for Jewish professionals was told.

Michel Chokron, a past president of the Communaute Sepharade du Quebec (CSQ), suggested to a gathering of 50 Jewish professionals at the l'Hotel du Fort that the Jewish community has not responded adequately to this possibility.

He spoke during an all-day seminar organized by the Communaute a la Une, an initiative by Federation CJA, CSQ, and Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q) to foster positive ties between the Jewish community's Ashkenazi and Sephardi segments.

If Quebec separates, Chokron speculated, it could trigger a "massive exodus" of young adults and professionals that the once-thriving Moroccan community witnessed, leaving only the poor and elderly behind.

There could be a "collapse of the middle class," said Chokron, a professor at the Ecole des Hautes Etudes Commerciales. "We have to react to this phenomenon."

Chokron recalled attending meetings of community leaders where the prospect of a referendum prompted comments bordering on "hysteria."

If "leadership" reacts that way, he asked, what will the overall community response be?

Although Chokron hoped he was wrong and qualified his opinion as coming from an "amateur," other participants at the seminar made it clear they did not share his apocalyptic vision.

Maxyne Finkelstein, community planning director for Federation CJA, argued that Morocco, historically, did not share Canada's democratic traditions.

Jack Jedwab, CJC-Q's community relations director, cautioned against "precipitating a crisis" when the jury is still very much out. "We have to be prudent," he said.

It was also noted that even if the Parti Quebecois (PQ) wins the forthcoming provincial election — which recent polls indicate is by no means guaranteed — there is no telling how the promised referendum on sovereignty will play out.

In fact, when a PQ government did hold power, the audience was reminded, it supported Jewish community institutions as much as if not more than the Liberals.

Chokron's views, it was argued, also did not take into account projects like ProMontreal, aimed at keeping the Jewish young in Montreal.

The picture of Quebec Jewry drawn by Jim Torczyner, a McGill University social work professor, Finkelstein, and Federation CJA executive vice-president Steven Drysdale, was generally of a stable and vital community.

But it is also one moving to adapt to new demographic realities and which is seeking mechanisms to bring the Sephardi community closer to the power structures, they said.

The new demographic picture is not yet known, Torczyner said, since data about the actual "construction" of the Jewish community — extrapolated from the 1991 Canadian census — will not be analyzed fully until June.

What is known, however, is that Jewish immigration to Montreal has offset the decline dating back 20 years. The Jewish population — now at about the 100,000 mark — suffered a net loss of only two per cent over the last decade. About 15 per cent of the community consists of immigrants, about half from the former Soviet Union and Israel.

Torczyner said the major challenges facing the community are how to contend with an elderly population of 24 per cent and a rising number of poor, especially before immigrants have been here long enough to become true "participants" in community life.

In the last five years, over 1,000 Jews who moved away from Montreal came back, and Drysdale said he anticipates many Jewish university students from outside Quebec may plan to remain here.

Montreal is also attractive because it has a lower cost of living than other cities and is widely-known as a "centre" for Jewish life.

Torczyner said that Montreal has witnessed a "feminization" of poverty comprised of immigrants, single mothers and elderly women living alone who are "falling between the cracks." Two-thirds of elderly Jewish women living alone live below the poverty line.

Finkelstein said the community continues to benefit from its traditional character and its "high-affiliation" rate. But it is also moving towards a more "inclusive" approach to community planning.

The federation, for example, is recommending funding to a more diverse range of recipients that includes the secular and ultra Orthodox, and even gay rights groups.

But using the Canadian Census for community planning, while essential, is not the be-all or end-all, she stressed. It serves as a framework, but while "we love numbers, you shouldn't overuse them. We can even be fooled by them."

For example, census information helped Federation CJA community planners react to poverty-level figures and decide to open a West Island office.

But it also produced ultimately unjustified fears about the decline of the community and could not take into account the influence of Jewish immigration to the city.

The major issues facing community planners now are: the lack of growth of certain "age cohorts;" the shrinkage of the health and social service system; ensuring that students exit the Jewish school system "functionally bilingual;" the middle-aged unemployed; and seeking "alternative family structures" for the elderly living with no support because younger members have left the city.

During the discussion period, CSQ director James Dahan suggested the Sephardi community is still not being invited to play an active role in the community planning process.

Drysdale replied that the unity of the community has been the "largest and most intensive issue" he has faced since taking on the job 16 months ago.

But he said he has seen progress.

More Sephardim now serve on the federation's professional staff and as heads of departments, and their presence will make a difference within lay structures, Drysdale said.

In Finkelstein's view, "it is only a matter of time" before leadership development within the Sephardi community makes more inclusion within the "power" levels of federation inevitable.

But Chokron was unconvinced.

"Me, I think we're living through a profound leadership crisis because the structure prevents a common vision.

"We have to transform this perception."

Weizmann symposium tackles issue of fertility

MONTREAL — The Weizmann Institute of Science in Israel has been at the forefront in investigating new treatments for fertility problems. In 1992, for example, Weizmann found that the injection of a certain growth factor into mice prevented miscarriages.

But at a recent symposium sponsored by the Weizmann Montreal chapter's professional group, Alliance Weizmann, one of the panelists took science to task for encouraging people to "jump on the technological bandwagon" in helping them to procreate.

According to Abby Lippman, chair of the human genetics committee for the Council of Responsible Genetics in Cambridge, MA and a member of McGill University's department of epidemiology, scientific technology should stop treating infertility as a "disease" and start to focus on the "societal" issues that help to make couples infertile.

Lippman was joined on the panel by Dr. Edward Keyserlinck, a professor of medicine and member of the Centre for Medicine, Ethics and Law at McGill University, and Dr. Pierre Miron, who heads the city's leading private institute for treating infertility, the Institut de Medecine de la Reproduction de Montreal.

Speaking on the theme of "new challenges" to infertility, Lippman, for one, was clearly against the emphasis being placed on using in vitro fertilization (IVF) as the main approach for couples unable to conceive "naturally."

While IVF has its place, Lippman argued that far too much money is being spent on such treatments even though the vast majority of couples eventually conceive the old-fashioned way.

Infertility "is not a disease," Lippman contends, and money would be better be spent on issues like poverty, violence, sexually-transmitted diseases (STD's) and environmental factors that that also contribute to infertility.

For example, Lippman said studies suggest that women from impoverished backgrounds produce fewer eggs, and that pregnant women are more subject to physical abuse, raising the risk of miscarriage.

The technological focus is also unfair because only the well-to-do can afford it, Lippman said. IVF often costs upwards of $12,000 and in Canada, only Ontario pays for it under its provincial health care regulations.

Miron, by contrast, is an enthusiastic proponent of IVF and other reproductive technologies.

The positive news, he said, is that success rates for infertile couples or single women using IVF — which creates an embryo outside the womb later implanted in the uterus — is approaching the impregnation rates seen among people during their most fertile years. That success rate is based on three IVF attempts.

The average age of women coming in for IVF is 34, and couples on average wait five years before trying IVF. — D.L.

Jewish continuity lecture

TORONTO — Studies have shown the Canadian Jewish community lags behind the American by one generation, but the director of community services and youth activities of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, does not accept this as predetermined.

"We can see the problems of intermarriage, assimilation and abandonment of heritage," said Susan Jackson. "But we have the ability to change and survive. If we each take personal responsibility for the continuity of Jewish identity we can reverse the American model and make Judaism come alive for the next and succeeding generations."

Jackson will deliver the Rosalynd Smith Memorial Lecture on the topic of Jewish continuity Wednesday, April 6 at 8 p.m. at the Adath Israel Congregation, 37 Southbourne Ave.

Back To The Future: Recapturing Judaism for the Next Generation is open to the community.

"We expect young couples and newly-marrieds, and those with young children will be especially interested in Susan's message, as well as those of us with older children for whom the issue has been a concern for some time," said event chair Roz Davidson.

For further information call Adath Israel Congregation at 635-5340.

Nazi film masked true horror of Terezin

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Rare footage from The Fuhrer Gives A City To The Jews, the only film known to have been made inside an operating German concentration camp, was shown recently at Harbourfront's du Maurier Theatre as part of an evening of music and film entitled Lost Composers: Music from Terezin.

Jewish inmates of Terezin, robust and smiling, are shown dancing, gardening, working in factories, relaxing in the sunshine and applauding concerts and soccer games.

Jewish children are shown at play in a playground, happily receiving bread and fruit from their captors, running joyously into a large swimming pool. Nurses and doctors are shown warmly tending Jewish patients in the camp's infirmary.

Except for the occasional flash of a Star of David badge and the running title that warns one is seeing a "staged Nazi film," one might almost believe Terezin was a popular resort or summer camp instead of an internment camp into which some 140,000 persons, mostly Jewish, were crammed as they awaited transport to the Auschwitz death camp.

Nazi propaganda minister Joseph Goebbels ordered the film made in August 1944 to show the International Red Cross and the world at large that Jews were being well-treated at Terezin. In September, the director and most of the crew, actors and extras were included in mass transports to Auschwitz.

Situated an hour's drive north of Prague in Bohemia, Terezin held many professional Jewish musicians from the finest orchestras and opera houses of Europe (one survivor was Karel Ancerl, who became musical director of the Toronto Symphony from 1968 until his death in 1973). The Nazi's freizeitgestaltung policy allowed prisoners at Terezin to practice cultural activities to pacify them as they awaited transfer to the death camps, and to provide evidence to international inspectors that Terezin was a model ghetto.

Thus, when children from the Jewish Hagibor orphanage in Prague arrived at Terezin in 1943, they continued to give performances of the opera Brundibar, learned in their former home. Brundibar was performed 55 times during 12 months. A cinematic version of the opera, filmed in 1938, was shown at the Harbourfront event.

Presented by New Music Concerts, the evening also featured performances of musical works that composers Gideon Klein, Hans Krasa, Viktor Ullman, Pavel Haas and Rudolf Karel wrote while at Terezin. All five composers were dead before war's end.

Like the Nazi propaganda film, the music neglects the sad but central fact that it emerged from a hellishly overcrowded anteroom to a gas chamber. New Music Concerts artistic director Robert Aitken described the music as post-romantic and said much of it was written on scraps of paper, making it difficult to find complete authentic scores.

The elaborate program notes, written by Austin Clarkson of York University, provide a scholarly history of Terezin, the two films and the music. In a preface, Aitken wrote: "The wealth of talent lost and number of works unwritten should remind us all, not only of Terezin, but of the futility of prejudice, the terrible senseless waste and the needless suffering that can result from excessive nationalism, intolerance and bigotry."

A subheading in the program described the well-attended evening as offering "Music for the Survival of the Spirit."

A scene from the 1944 Nazi propaganda film The Fuhrer Gives a City to the Jews.

Sotheby's celebrates 10 years in Israel with art auction

TEL AVIV —To celebrate its 10th anniversary in Israel, Sotheby's, the only international auction house to hold regular specialized sales of Judaica, will be auctioning 19th and 20th century paintings, drawings and sculpture on Monday, April 4 at 7:30 p.m.

A sale of important Judaica: books, manuscripts, works of art and paintings will be held on Wednesday, April 6 at 3:30 p.m. Both sales will take place in the Tel Aviv Hilton.

Since 1984, Sotheby's has established Israel as an important centre in the international art market, with sales in Israel last year totalling $14.5 million.

A record for any work of art sold at auction in the country was established when a private American buyer purchased Chagall's painting Return from the Synagogue for $1,652,500.

Sotheby's also set a record for Judaica metalwork when a pair of 17th century German Torah finials sold for $423,154 in Geneva in 1993.

Among the paintings in the forthcoming sale is Marc Chagall's Souvenir de Paris, an oil painting executed in 1976, which includes many of his favorite motifs, such as the Eiffel Tower.

A group of works representative of the Israeli abstract school of the 1950s and 1960s from the private collection the late Mr. Sam Dubiner is, according to director Daniella Luxembourg, "the ultimate collection of such works."

One of its outstanding pieces of avant-garde art is a monumental sculpture entitled King of the Shepherds by Itzhak Danziger. Works by artists such as Streichmann, Stematsky, Agam and Tumarkin are also included.

The sale of important Judaica includes many fine pieces of ritual silver. An exceptional burial society beaker dated 1732 and inscribed with dozens of names of the society's members comes from the town of Alsbach, near Darmstadt in Germany, which had a thriving Jewish community in the late 17th and early 18th century.

A large, early 19th century Ukranian flamboyantly decorated Chanukah lamp and a pair of Dutch Torah finials dating from the beginning of the 18th century made by Eastern European filigree workers who had emigrated to Amsterdam are also of interest.

Among the textiles is an embroidered silk and velvet Torah ark curtain, dated 1818, dedicated to the memory of famed Viennese hostess, Baroness Fanny von Arnstein, by her husband, Baron Nathan von Arnstein, who was financier to the Austrian crown.

In addition, Rivka Saker, a director of Sotheby's in Tel Aviv, announced that, as part of Sotheby's worldwide 250th anniversary celebration, important works from the Impressionist and Contemporary sales to be held in London and New York in May and June will be exhibited in Tel Aviv on March 28-29.

Jewish Service Corps holds first reunion

NEW YORK — When Ted Nevins, 23, went to Bombay through the Jewish Service Corps (JSC), little did he know he was to become editor and publisher of India's most widely read Jewish newsletter, Kol Bombay (The Voice of Bombay).

Nevins and other volunteers shared their stories at the first JSC reunion held here recently.

The American Joint Distribution Committee created the JSC in 1985 to meet manpower demands in Jewish communities overseas. Since then, 26 North American Jews have gone abroad to contribute their talents for a year.

Volunteers have done everything from taking part in an Indian Melida ceremony, an offering of fruits and rice to the prophet Elijah on happy occasions, to joining a Moroccan Jewish pilgrimage to the tombs of revered "saints." Others have lived in Bulgaria and Tunisia.

Nevins helped organize three Jewish libraries in Bombay, taught the Aleph-bet to kindergarten students, and discussed Jewish issues with adults. Being part of the Bombay community made him more aware of overseas Jewry and its needs, he said.

The JSC is currently recruiting for educational, social, cultural and religious positions in India and Bulgaria. Applicants should have a strong Jewish identity, be self-starting and preferable experienced in living abroad. Travel, housing and expenses are provided by the Joint.

Those interested should send a resume specifying their area of interest to: Jewish Service Corps, American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, 711 Third Avenue, New York, NY 10017.

Veteran Israeli tour guide educates travel professionals

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — "Just to show you how small Israel is, take Vancouver Island," says Aharon Lahav in front of a hotel ballroom filled with Canadian travel agents. "The state of Israel fits nicely onto Vancouver Island."

A veteran Israeli tour guide, Lahav traveled across Canada last week, narrating a colorful slideshow for more than 900 travel professionals in Edmonton, Calgary, Vancouver, Toronto and Montreal.

Lahav was the guest of the Israel Government Tourist Office, which arranged the traveling presentation in conjunction with El Al Airlines.

In a ballroom of the Delta Chelsea Hotel in Toronto, Lahav described the major topographic features of Israel — including the Golan Heights, Galilee, Jordan Valley, Dead Sea and Eilat — as though they had all miraculously been squeezed onto the MacDonald-Cartier Highway between Toronto and Montreal.

"These are all along 500 kilometres of one road," he said. "You can drive it in a week, and you won't have one dull moment."

Orienting his audience to a place that most had never visited, Lahav described many historic sites, including those of special interest to Christians, showed activities ranging from horseback riding to hand gliding, previewed deluxe resorts, and addressed safety concerns.

"Israel proper, without the territories, is a very safe place, according to the pre-1967 borders," he said. "The West Bank and Gaza Strip have all the troubles, and these are the places we don't take the tourists."

Lahav told his audience Israel has four seas — "the Med, Fed, Dead and Red" — the Fed Sea being another name for the Sea of Galilee, where Jesus reportedly fed the masses. He inspired smiles again when describing the modern service through which religious Jews in the Diaspora may fax a prayer to be slipped between stones of the Western Wall. But mostly he seemed to inspire awe and reverence with the views of Jerusalem's Old City, the archaeological dig at Beit Shean, and the noble and tragic mountain called Masada.

Ruth Ben-Tzur, director of the Israel Government Tourist Office in Canada, also spoke to the crowd in each of the five cities. After the Toronto event, she told The Canadian Jewish News, "We're proud that so many travel agents have attended these evenings. They don't come for ideological reasons but because they find Israel is profitable and of great importance to their business.

Ruth Ben-Tzur

"There's no way to sell Israel without knowing it quite well. It's not like Florida or Las Vegas. You're selling much more than sun, fun and food."

Samuel Kalev, El Al's district manager for Ontario and Western Canada, spoke briefly in each city, telling audiences that 1993 was the airline's eighth consecutive year of profits.

Dr. Florence served as co-chair of DVI

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Dr. Max Florence, a dentist dedicated to helping disadvantaged children in Israel, died recently in Toronto. He was 68.

Born and raised in Peterborough, Florence established a practice in Ottawa where he successfully led a campaign to put fluoride in Ottawa's drinking water. He served as president of the Ottawa Dental Society in the early 1960s and was an honorary member of the Ottawa Academy of Medicine.

Dr. Max Florence

In 1968, Florence moved to Israel with his wife and three children. He established a large dental practice in Jerusalem. In 1977 he moved to Toronto and served as chief of dentistry at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care for about a decade while maintaining a private practise.

Shortly after the founding of a branch of the Dental Volunteers for Israel (DVI) in Toronto by fellow dentist Dr. Alfred Intrator, Florence became co-chair. DVI is a free dental clinic for children from indigent families located in Jerusalem's low income district of Mekor Hayim. More than 200 disadvantaged children, many of them olim, receive dental treatment there each day.

Florence helped spearhead fundraising and solicited volunteer dentists to work at the clinic, where he volunteered himself three times.

"In all this work with DVI for the last 10 years, Max has been an outstanding force in all our endeavors and we shall sadly miss his devotion and enthusiasm," Intrator told The CJN.

Florence was also known for designing the Sulcabrush, a toothbrush with bristles at both ends to massage the gums and help prevent gum disease for those who do not like to floss.

He leaves his wife Rochelle, children Lloyd and Ira, and one grandchild.

A scholarship in memory of Dr. Max Florence will be established at DVI-Canada. Memorial donations can be sent to DVI-Canada, 212 Dunvegan Rd., Toronto M5P 2P2. All donations are tax-receipted.

Controversial cellist is a crowd pleaser

By PAULA CITRON
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Canadian Friends of Ezrath Nashim-Herzog Hospital recently held a gala benefit concert at the Centennial Ballroom at the Inn on the Park, showcasing the considerable talents of acclaimed cellist Ofra Harnoy and the dean of Canadian accompanists, the always excellent Derek Bampton.

This is the second year in a row that Harnoy has been the featured soloist for this charity event, and judging from the large audience that turned out despite inclement weather, the controversial cellist is a proven crowd pleaser.

Critics and musicians often do not know what to make of Harnoy. She is young, attractive and plays her instrument passionately; unfortunately, this very youth, beauty and passion tend to obscure her musicianship and talent in the eyes of her colleagues and peers.

Stripping away these superficial attributes, one finds a talented woman whose strength lies in finding nuance in the music. She is an interpreter even more than she is a technician. Her passion is underlined by intelligence and every note is motivated by the music itself. Contrary to accepted opinion, Harnoy does not turn works into melodrama, and every interpretation she makes can be justified within the score. She has a keen sensibility to the mood of the music; pieces become alive and vibrant in her hands. One might not agree with her interpretation per se, but at least her music-making is not dry and academic.

Happily, Harnoy chose a challenging program for the benefit concert rather than resorting to "accessible" music. The major work was Prokofiev's Sonata in C major, whose deceptively simple folksy Russian rhythms cover up a multitude of complexities. Harnoy showed she could muster the strength needed to render the weight of the first movement with its low register playing and heavy strumming. She was not a shrinking violet in her attack. The beauty of her playing, however, lies in her ability to swing effortlessly into the more melodic and lyric passages from those of the bravura. In her hands, the Prokofiev sonata captured the depth and scope of a vast country, yet managed to contain the love of song inherent in the Russian people; it was at once majestic and delicate.

Also included in the program was a newly commissioned piece from Toronto-based composer Srul Irving Glick based on three paintings by Marc Chagall. Given Glick's penchant for Jewish themes, it is understandable why the Chagall paintings were appealing as a source of inspiration in their celebration of Jewish heritage. The work, entitled Chagall Suite for Cello and Piano, is in three sections which follow the paintings, The Cellist, The Lights of the Wedding and The Big Circus." Collectively, they are a delight.

The first is a droll rendering of the cello employing every technique, yet never losing sight of the melody line, which is reminiscent of a Jewish folk tune. The second is a lovely lyrical song-like passage filled with nostalgia, romance and sentiment. The Circus section is filled with fun and humor. Ragged rhythms and incomplete melodies mirror the frantic and chaotic state of things. At one point, the pianist, supposedly the Ringmaster, gets to stand-up and subdue, with a glare, the cellist who has gone overboard in self-indulgent playing, after which she answers meekly on her instrument while the piano dominates the score. At the end of the piece, the cello gets the last word, so to speak, following a spirited dialogue between the two instruments. Overall, the Chagall Suite is inventive and charming and Harnoy and Bampton had great fun with it.

Rounding out the program were Tchaikowsky's Autumn Song and Kreisler's Liebesleid, which along with Schumann's Fantasiestucke, collectively allowed the cellist to show off her skills. The Tchaikowsky and Kreisler pieces require a delicate approach to a simple melody line without complication, while the Schumann necessitates bravura technique within a romantic and passionate setting. In these pieces, as with the rest of the program, Harnoy, and her able and discreet accompanist Bampton, paid full service to the music.

Jewish Film Festival offers diverse features

TORONTO — After a smashing first year, the Toronto Jewish Film Festival unreels for the second time April 28 to May 5 at the Bloor Cinema.

The festival is a collection of more than 30 feature-length and short subject dramatic and documentary films from 11 countries. Topics include the Holocaust, love and contemporary European and Israeli experiences. All films express the diversity of the Jewish experience.

Highlights this year will include: 1994 Academy Award nominee Chicks in White Satin (U.S.A., 1993), the poignant and very funny story of two women preparing for their traditional Jewish weddings; Birthplace (Poland, 1992), a complex mystery-thriller of one man's search to know the circumstances surrounding his father's murder; The King of Crown Heights (U.S.A., 1992), a look inside the Lubavitcher chassidic movement; Zohar (Israel, 1993), the rise and fall of Israeli rock singer Zohar Argov; Good Evening Mr. Wallenberg (Sweden, 1992), the gripping story of Swedish diplomat Raoul Wallenberg; and Everything is Fine (Ukraine, 1992), a quirky collage of contemporary Jewish Life in post-Soviet Ukraine.

Eleven filmmakers and guests have been invited to attend the festival and present their films. Visitors will discuss the Holocaust, Righteous Gentiles and the rise of the new right in Europe.

Passover cookbook dishes up memorable recipes

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Passover celebrates the exodus of the Jewish people from Egypt. In virtually every Jewish home, it also marks a a period of culinary overindulgence.

As the Haggadah aptly puts it: "Let all those who are hungry come in and eat..."

Susan Friedland's sumptuously-illustrated cookbook, The Passover Table (HarperCollins, $23), can help any household usher in the holiday.

A food writer and editor, Friedland does not skimp on scope. She presents more than 40 recipes, both traditional and modern, for seders and meals throughout Passover.

Her easy-to-follow recipes fall under four basic categories — appetizers and soups, entrees, vegetables, kugels and stuffing, and desserts.

In this eclectic collection, Friedland ranges near and far. The old East European stand-bys — chicken soup, knaidlach and chopped liver — are included. But so are relatively unfamiliar Sephardi dishes like tangine of chicken and spinach pie.

It's difficult, of course, to bake without flour or baking powder. But do not despair. Friedland dishes up mouthwatering recipes for such delights as coconut macaroons and walnut cake.

With The Passover Table at your beck and call, you'll have no problem whipping up memorable meals for the holiday.

Saxophonist, pianist electrify synagogue musical recital

By JACK KOHANE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Paul Brodie, Canada's most celebrated concert saxophonist, and renowned pianist Valerie Tryon were the featured artists at an electrifying musical recital presented by Beth Tikvah Synagogue earlier this month.

From Ragtime to Bernstein highlighted songs and classical sonatas penned by this century's most beloved Jewish composers, including Irving Berlin, George Gershwin, Leonard Bernstein, Richard Rodgers and many others.

The packed house was treated to Brodie and his brassy rendition of hit tunes like Fascinatin' Rhythm, I Got Rhythm, My Favorite Things, Cheek to Cheek, and Stormy Weather.

Brodie is the undisputed king of concert saxophonists. During his long and distinguished professional career, which spans over 3,000 concert venues, he has played to adoring crowds in Israel, the United States, Singapore, France, China (twice) and Australia. He remains the most recorded concert saxophonist in the history of the instrument, with 45 albums to his credit. His latest recording, Back to the Golden Ages of the Saxophone: Music of the '20s, is due for release in early April.

According to Brodie, crossover programs such as the one given at Beth Tikvah are challenging for any musician. "But it is also one of the most entertaining experiences for audience and artist alike," he said.

Brodie brought it off brilliantly, delighting with the wonderfully lilting suite Scaramouche, composed by Darius Milhaud in 1939. Brodie and Tryon mingled their prodigious skills together to play three joyous, bouncing movements from the classic suite, Vif, Modere, and Braziliera. The Latin American flavor of these pieces conjured up images of flamenco dancers.

Tryon, a concert pianist, said she found the program a welcome change of pace. "There is an intimacy here with the audience that cannot be duplicated. It is unusual to be playing so many different types of numbers and songs at one concert, but I am enjoying it immensely."

As a soloist, she has played the great concert halls of Europe and North America. In 1986, the Government of Hungary's Ministry of Culture bestowed her with the Franz Liszt Medal, one of the highest honors given to a concert pianist.

The Beth Tikvah audience showed its appreciation by singing along to Gershwin's Somebody Loves Me, S'Wonderful, and Summertime.

The evening's most emotionally charged moments centred on Adio, a sonata composed by Srul Glick, Beth Tikvah's concert series producer and choirmaster. The piece was commissioned by the World Saxophone Congress in 1992, and made its Canadian debut that evening.

Glick said 1992 commemorated the 500th anniversary of the discovery of the New World by Christopher Columbus. "But more to the point, it marked the date of the expulsion of the Jews from Spain." He was inspired to write the piece while looking out over Jerusalem during an earlier visit.

Adio (farewell in Spanish), embodies the bitterness of those who lived in a tolerant Spain for centuries. In recognition of this, Brodie's instrument seemed to wail out a juxtaposition of mellifluous Hebraic and Latino melodies during the first somber movements. The sonata's thundering climax came with a complex interweaving of saxophone and piano harmonies, flowing in a near improvisational style. This final movement symbolized the triumph and celebration of the rebirth of a people and a nation.

This was a concert of contrasts. The range of musical styles, and the messages they contained, moved the audience from sadness to exhilaration. Brodie and Tryon gave a masterful performance in an exceptional evening of entertainment. It was a rare experience, not soon forgotten.

By BERNARD BASKIN

The Hope by Herman Wouk, (Little, Brown & Co. $29.95)

For his tenth novel, Herman Wouk has chosen a formidable subject: the stirring saga of Israel's creation and survival over two portentous decades. The story begins in 1948 with the nation's fate hanging in the balance, and concludes with Israel's astonishing victory in the Six-Day War and the reuniting of Jerusalem.

In structuring the mammoth work (687 pages) around Israel's War of Independence, the Suez War and the Six-Day War, Wouk indicates that "The Hope has been the product of painstaking comparison of sources, weighing of possibilities and interviews with persons involved in events who often differ widely about what really happened."

The events depicted are engrossing and often exciting: the building of the "Burma Road" to relieve a besieged Jerusalem, the sanguinary and obstinate Latrun battles, the invaluable assistance of American Colonel David "Mickey" Marcus and his accidental death by an unwary Israeli soldier, the daring dash of Moshe Dayan through Lod and Ramle and the use of an ancient Roman road by General Yigal Allon to capture El Arish.

Also detailed is the Altalena episode which pitted a feisty David Ben-Gurion against an equally determined Menachem Begin and his Irgun cohorts, an unhappy clash of ideologies that could have led to a disastrous civil war of Jew against Jew.

In 1956 Israel, in conjunction with British and French forces, attacked Egypt which had nationalized the Suez Canal. Israel's brilliant march to the canal and the capture of Sharm El Sheikh were vitiated by an enraged President Dwight D. Eisenhower, fearful of Russian retaliation.

Wouk regards the Six-Day War as essentially a struggle for water. He augments his description of the war's major events with surprising information about some behind-the-scenes diplomatic manoeuvering. The American Secretary of Defence informs an Israeli official that President Lyndon Johnson has received from Eisenhower a verbal communication that in view of Israel's good faith withdrawal from Sinai in 1956 and the American guarantee of the status quo which Nasser has now abrogated, the United States would not interfere with Israel's freedom to act.

When news comes of the unexpected capture of Jerusalem and the Temple Mount there is exultation. "Fathers and sons, mothers and children, wives and husbands, sweethearts, newlyweds, comrades in arms out on the battlefield, all are fused in a once-in-a-lifetime, once-in-a-millennium surge of the spirit. Everywhere in the Holy Land Jews embrace, dance, and sing: 'This is the Day the Lord has made . . .' "

The Hope deserves readership for its historical underpinning and sheer narrative force. Unhappily, however, it suffers from undue length, exasperating prolixity, contrived sexual encounters and characters that rarely achieve credibility.

The years that Wouk spent in researching and writing this book were not wasted, but it is not the work we were eagerly awaiting.

Father of modern Hebrew a tragically flawed figure

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — He was the father of the Hebrew language but he ruled his family like a tyrant, raising his first-born son in isolation so Ben Zion would become the world's first child never to have heard or spoken anything but Hebrew. He did not even allow him to see another child till he was five.

It's no wonder that Wordmaker the Israeli-made film about Eliezer Ben-Yehuda raised the hackles of the Toronto Jewish Film Society capacity audience recently. Nor that he was described as "a genius with a tragic flaw in his personality," by Libby Garshowitz, moderator of the discussion period.

Wordmaker doesn't lack for high-pitched emotions. For example, Ben-Yehuda heartlessly berates his first wife for slipping up and singing a Russian lullaby to the 3-year-old Ben Zion, frightened during a thunderstorm. Ben Zion responds by speaking for the first time in his life (in Hebrew, of course), a curt command to his father to stop striking his mother. The parents are overjoyed to hear these first words.

Later, in New York, in 1917, where Ben-Yehuda is raising funds for his 17-volume Hebrew dictionary, Ben Zion reveals to his father how he resented being used as a guinea pig for Hebrew. Then it is Ben-Yehuda's turn to confess that when all four children were ill with pneumonia, he prayed hardest for Ben Zion's recovery, and the death of two other children had haunted him since.

Ben-Yehuda's life in Palestine, where he first came from Russia in 1881, was anything but tranquil. He suffered from tuberculosis. He ran afoul of religious authorities who were displeased with his goal of turning the language of the Torah into everyday speech. A misunderstood editorial in his Zvi newspaper, "a daily which comes out once a week," was seized on by the Chief Rabbis to excommunicate him and to turn him over to the Turks. A world-wide protest by Jews led to his release in 10 days.

But the enmity of the rabbis did not let up. When his first wife, Dvorah, died at a young age, they tried unsuccessfully to prevent him from burying her in a Jewish cemetery.

Six months later he married Hameda, her younger sister, and it was Hameda who engineered her husband's trip to New York and later completed the dictionary, following Ben-Yehuda's death in Palestine in 1922, at age 64. But Hameda, too, bent to Ben-Yehuda's iron will. She complied with his decision that their daughters would not dine with guests, but the son would.

The flashback technique in the made-for-Israeli-TV $200,000 movie, makes it difficult to concentrate on this Israeli hero's accomplishments, so draining is the emotional content. It is a true successor to the crisis-ridden Yiddish plays of earlier days.

A flashback which Ben-Yehuda himself carries in his mind concerns his arguments in Paris, during his student days, with a Trotskyite who said Jewish nationalism was dead and internationalism was the future. "Jewish nationalism is not dead, just unconscious," Ben-Yehuda replied.

He refused to speak Yiddish with other Jews, believing it to be a threat to Hebrew. On the other hand, he spoke English to American Jews, saying English was no threat.

During his four-year stay in New York, he was guilt-ridden that he was away from Palestine during the critical days of World War I.

Script Workshop: Fran Biderman and Roselle Stone, actresses and longtime members of Medina Theatre Ensemble, have jointly written a stageplay entitled There Comes A Time ....

Part comedy, part serious drama, the play explores the lives of senior citizens. To see whether the characterizations stand up and what dialogue can be trimmed, the authors have scheduled a workshop at the Bloor Street Y, 750 Spadina Ave., for Sunday April 25, 1:30 p.m. to 5 p.m. Noted actor-director Sean Mulcahy will direct.

Biderman and Stone are seeking talented volunteers from the mid-30s to the mid-70s to join the nine-member cast.

Seeking Playwrights: The Jewish Theatre Committee of Toronto is looking for the authors of a score of plays submitted to its Canadian Jewish Playwriting Contest over the past three years. Because of a series of professional staff and venue changes, records have been lost.

Among the entries are a number of worthy scripts that deserve public recognition and attention. The committee would like to plan some programs around these scripts, but need the permission of the playwrights.

If you have submitted a play to this contest, please contact Luni Bendayan at the JCC, 750 Spadina Ave., Toronto, M5S 2J2. Phone: (416) 924-6211.

Entertainment Milestones: This column takes official notice of two events that shook the entertainment world in 1964. One of these was the appearance of The Beatles on The Ed Sullivan Show. The second was the opening in New York City in September of the musical, Fiddler On The Roof.

Written by Jerry Bock with lyrics by Sheldon Harnick, Fiddler is based on Joseph Stein's book, itself an adaptation of the beloved Yiddish writer Sholem Aleichem's stories about peasant life in czarist Russia.

An examination of Sholem Aleichem's original stories reveals what treasures Stein had to work with: in many cases he used large stretches of dialogue verbatim.

As every reader of this column must know, the story concerns the lives and customs of poor Jewish Russian villagers in 1905, and focuses on Tevye the dairyman, his wife Golde, and their five daughters, whom he attempts to raise by the dictates of 'tradition.'

A 30th-anniversary revival of the much-lauded Broadway favorite opens at the Leah Posluns Theatre on April 7 and runs to May 1. Gerry Salsberg, who has trod across the boards at Leah Posluns many times, takes the role of Tevye, opposite Deedee Langford as Golde, Miriam Newhouse as Yente the Matchmaker, Allan Price as Lazar Wolfe and Jack Duffy as the Rabbi. Fresh from her directorial success with One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest, Reva Stern is producer as well as director of the 35-member cast.

Tickets ($14.50 to $22) are available through the theatre box office (416-630-6752) or Ticketmaster (416-872-1111).

Joseph Returns: Livent chair Garth Drabinsky and O'Keefe Centre manager Martin Onrot have announced the return of Livent's hit production of Andrew Lloyd Webber's Joseph And The Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat, starring Donny Osmond, in May 1995 for a third limited engagement. The play, a joyous musical retelling of the Biblical story of Joseph and his brothers at the time of the Pharaoh received its North American premiere in Toronto's Elgin Theatre in June 1992.

For one week beginning Sunday April 24, the school presents the exhibition Through the Eyes of the Child: A Journey to Paradise, which displays the work of the children who attend the school's fine arts kindergarten and after-school arts club. Hours are 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. and 7 p.m. to 9 p.m. on weekdays, and 11 a.m. to 5 p.m. weekends. Admission is free and families are welcome. Phone: (416) 961-1502.

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

Roughly three millennia ago, it took Moses and the Children of Israel 40 years of wandering in the desert to reach the Promised Land. Flying direct and even non-stop, today's travellers to Israel generally reap the benefits of much better connections.

El Al, the national carrier of Israel, needs only about 12 hours to whisk you from Toronto to Tel Aviv. The only wandering anyone might do nowadays is in seeking out the baggage carousels at Ben Gurion Airport.

El Al operates two direct flights weekly from Toronto to Tel Aviv, on Mondays and Wednesdays, with a brief stop to pick up passengers in Montreal. Also, El Al offers direct service from most cities in western Canada through the participation of Canadian carriers.

"When you fly with El Al to Israel, you get there the fastest way possible, and you start experiencing the atmosphere of Israel as soon as you board the aircraft," says Samuel Kalev, El Al's district manager for Ontario and Western Canada.

Part of that atmosphere aboard El Al's wide-bodied aircraft is the range of culinary service. "We serve a variety of menus, from vegetarian to diabetic to the 'Little Prince' meals geared for children — and everything we serve is kosher," says Kalev.

Other in-flight benefits include religious, classical and pop music audio programming in Hebrew and English. All El Al pilots are veterans of the Israeli Air Force.

In keeping with recent marketing trends, El Al features a frequent flyer's club, allowing regular passengers to accumulate bonus points that can be exchanged for free tickets to any of El Al's more than 40 destinations worldwide. The use of airport lounges, expedited check-in lines, preferential handling and other amenities are available to travellers through the airline's King David Club, which costs $160 (US) annually to join ($80 for spouses).

According to figures supplied by Kalev, about 38,000 people travelled by air from Canada to Israel in each of the last two years, and El Al's share of this traffic is approximately 60 per cent. El Al's lowest published excursion fare is $1,301 from Toronto, $1,226 from Montreal, plus taxes, applicable throughout much of the winter low season. As with most airlines, reduced fares are often available through tour operators and travel wholesalers.

To keep pace with its competitors, El Al, in conjunction with the Canadian air carriers with whom it has preferred agreements, offers Canadian passengers the option of stopovers in any European gateway city. The airline's toll-free information and reservations line is 1-800-361-6174.

* * *

To be sure, there is stiff competition on the air routes between the land of the maple leaf and the land of milk and honey. Published fares of Canada-to-Israel flights on British Airways, Holland's KLM, Air France, Swissair and the German airline Lufthansa generally fall into line with El Al's rates. All these carriers offer kosher cuisine, though with less variety (and sometimes less reliability) than El Al.

Some Israeli-bound travellers prefer to fly on a European national carrier because it allows them to stretch their legs on terra firma during stopovers.

These stopovers can be long. British Airways passengers, for example, generally have to wait 10 hours or more at Heathrow for the connecting flight to Ben Gurion.

Having flown into Israel for 25 years, Lufthansa brings more tourists to Israel — some two million passengers in total, with 200,000 in 1993 alone — than any other airline. Lufthansa flights from Canada to Israel may include a stopover in Frankfurt at no extra charge. Likewise, KLM permits stopovers in Amsterdam, as does Swissair in Zurich and Air France in Paris, although representatives of these airlines say most Canadians holding tickets to Israel prefer to travel straight through.

"Tel Aviv is one of our biggest sellers out of Canada," says Air France sales rep Dinah Kutner. "Because the connection is so good — only three hours in Paris on the return flight — it sells itself. The flights are always full in the summer."

Last month, the Israeli government eased some restrictions on foreign airlines into Israel, changing the previous 50-50 regulatory split between El Al and foreign carriers to a potential 60-40 ratio in favor of foreign airlines like British Airways, KLM, Air France, Lufthansa and Swissair. Such a distinguished array of competitors is good news for travellers and should help make the already good service of Israel's national airline even better.

Mission With A Difference: Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University is sponsoring a bike mission through Israel, May 2 to May 11. The route winds from the Golan to Jerusalem, taking in archaeological excavations, historic sites, nature reserves, national parks and more.

Daily riding distances are between 60 km and 70 km and accommodation is in kibbutz guest houses. The cost is $2,500, of which $900 can be paid with Israel Bonds. Participants (limited to 100) are required to raise at least $1,500 in sponsored donations.

Pesach reservations high for many Israeli hotels

By MICHELE CHABIN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel's hotels will be full to overflowing during the upcoming Passover/Easter season, despite the slayings in Hebron last month, according to a tourism publication here.

According to a survey conducted by Travel News, a popular publication among those who work in Israel's tourism industry, the Hebron incident, in which a Jewish settler killed 30 Arabs, has had only a slight impact on holiday tourism.

In an article entitled Incoming Tourism Has Not Been Hurt, the newsletter stated that "very few tourists have canceled their trip in the wake of the massacre."

Some individuals and groups have pulled out, including Christian pilgrims who had planned to spend Easter in the Holy Land, the article noted. And it added that there could be "some last-minute cancellations" if the security situation worsens.

"Some tourists who have made reservations are waiting to see what happens," the article said.

The fact that the tragedy has not resulted in a spate of cancellations has delighted tourism officials here, who had feared that tourists would stay away during the lucrative holiday season, much as they did before and during the 1991 Gulf War.

According to a Ministry of Tourism spokesman, Passover, which this year begins on March 26, and Easter, which this year falls on April 3, traditionally draw large numbers of visitors.

Of the 1.9 million people who visited Israel last year, nearly 275,000 planned their trips to coincide with Passover and Easter, according to the ministry.

"So far, Pesach reservations are looking very good," said Fiona Semberg, spokeswoman for the King David Hotel in Jerusalem. "There have been a few cancellations, but we can't say they are definitely due to what happened in Hebron. We just hope and pray that nothing will happen to affect the situation tomorrow."

She noted, however, "that a large percentage of our guests come back year after year, and that many come during Pesach to visit their family living in Israel. They're not the kind of people who are likely to cancel, regardless of the security situation."

"We are very pleased at the low number of cancellations," agreed Sara Fitterman, owner of the Ambassador Travel Agency in Jerusalem. "As far as we can tell, Passover visits haven't been overly affected by the tragedy. In Jerusalem, at least 85 per cent of the hotel rooms are booked. We expect 100 per cent occupancy by Pesach."

While holiday reservations remain steady, Fitterman expressed concern over the long term. "There has been a slowdown in the number of reservations for May and June, and a few cancellations, mostly among Jewish groups and individuals from the United States and France.

"I have the feeling that many potential tourists are taking a wait-and-see attitude, based on the political situation in the coming weeks and months." Fitterman said.

Looking Down The Avenue

Focusing on Toronto's Fashion Future

Converting Spadina Avenue into a residential area?

Boutique plans to bring 'magic back into the fashion industry'

By LORI DENNIS
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Not many industries have been as devastated by the recession as the fashion industry, particularly at the higher end. One by one the most reputable and exclusive of Toronto's fashion boutiques have shut their doors, leaving both their customers and their sales staff with fewer and fewer places to go.

Enter Michael Morris, 49, a businessman with a fresh new concept that he hopes will "bring the magic back to the fashion industry." It's called Direct Fashion Networking (DFN) and it's based on the belief that what customers want most of all is personal service — a little bit of pampering mixed with a lot of tasteful advice.

At DFN, customers are sought after by their favorite saleswomen who once served them faithfully at now defunct stores. Shelley Gold, Esther Kniznik, Gail Goldfarb, Susan Kirsh and Helen Mindel are all names that people who shopped at Creeds, Wendy Cherry and Brian Winston will remember.

"Primarily, I have created a business opportunity for fashion salespeople who were left without a home. I want them to treat DFN as if it's their own, to work the place with the freedom they need to make their customers happy. Secondarily, I have created a place for customers who still want top fashion with the service they deserve at this higher price level," explains Morris.

Located on Bayview Avenue, just north of Eglinton, is a 1,800-square-foot second floor showroom filled with seven European designer fashion collections and accessories — hats, belts, costume jewellery and perfume. The job of his sales staff, who work solely on commission and completely on their own hours, is to "network" the community for clientelle whose tastes and budget fit the merchandise and to personally escort them into the showroom.

Customers are then pampered with all the amenities they once enjoyed — free parking, a light lunch, a wine bar, comfortable dressing rooms, beautiful clothing and, most importantly, the expert advice and confidence of an experienced saleswoman that they trust.

Morris's concept, which takes us back to the fashion industry of prerecessionary days, came out of the need for survival in an industry that he believes lost its spark. His brainchild was initially tested four years ago with Rumorz — Fashion by Appointment, a showroom that he ran at Victoria Park and Steeles. In 1992, he took his concept to Jack Atkin and Sunny Choi and was responsible for running their place and increasing their sales for almost two years.

Now, Morris has struck out on his own once again in a business that he entered when he was only 16, selling dresses in his family's flea market in England.

TORONTO — Steven Kirsch and Mark Cowan, partners in Kirsch Construction and Project Management, have a vision for Spadina Avenue's declining fashion district.

Cowan, formerly of Bernard Cowan, a Canadian fashion group, says that because of various factors including free trade and global competition, the fashion industry is not what it was even five years ago.

"Most clothing can be imported at lower prices so price-wise, Canada is just not competitive. As well, stores cannot obtain the same credit limits they were able to get a few years ago. All these things are devastating the industry."

He adds, as a result of the fashion industry's decline, a number of good quality, architecturally beautiful buildings, most in the area running south from Queen to Front and east to McCall, are now standing empty. "Many family firms are gone, but the owners still own the buildings and they are wondering what to do with them. Taxes are high, there are no tenants, and they cannot sell the buildings."

This is where Kirsch, who has extensive background in design and construction, and Cowan feel they can help. What they would like to see is the fashion district become a residential area.

"The beauty of the fashion industry is that it is clean, with little pollution. As a result, these high quality buildings are in very good condition. They could easily be converted into living areas with lofts, studios or office space so the residents could live and work at home. With office space so expensive, there is a definite trend towards home-based businesses and these homes could be divided between living and working space. Conserving space is the new way of doing business and what residents would get is nice, clean working space that they can afford to keep up.

"As well, residents would live and work in the core of the city. They could easily get downtown in the evening and with people populating the buildings, the streets would be safer. Now, Spadina Avenue is empty at night."

The partners say that after they are able to change the area's zoning from commercial to residential, they will create homes that would be great for students, families or anyone else who would like a downtown lifestyle. "What we could do is create two-storey homes with large window spaces. Our specialty is design and execution. We show people how to make use of all the space they have. Owners could convert their buildings into rental or condominium properties — whatever they like."

Kirsch and Cowan agree that Spadina Avenue needs a facelift. "The area needs new life, and we know what to do to breathe some life into it."

BUSINESS BRIEFS

Signs of the Good Life

A recent flurry of trade figures from Jerusalem say a lot about lifestyles in Israel.

Many more Israelis are enjoying the good life. In January, automobile, refrigerator, dishwasher and VCR imports rose significantly. Nearly 7,500 VCRs and more than 12,000 cars were brought into the country during the first month of this year.

Government economic analysts credit a higher standard of living for the luxury import phenomenon.

Kibbutzim Seek Brighter Days

Year-end 1993 statistics, on the other hand, show that kibbutz business isn't what it used to be.

Kibbutz industry export revenues dropped close to 6 per cent from the previous year, even though revenue from all Israeli exports had increased by 20 per cent.

Micha Hertz, executive director of the Kibbutz Industries Association, blames the European recession for the tough times facing his members. Close to half of kibbutz products are shipped to Europe.

Hertz, however, sees better days ahead, pointing to an export upturn in the fourth quarter of last year.

Across the Israeli economy overall last year, exports rose by 11.8 per cent, but imports were up as well — by 13.9 per cent, creating a trade deficit of $6.18 billion.

A Month to Buy the Bank

Bidders for control of Israel's Bank Leumi have until April 18 to submit an offer.

The government currently holds about 73 per cent of Bank Leumi shares. M.I. Holdings, which is responsible for the sale of government owned bank shares, will soon be issuing an official call for tenders to companies interested in taking over 20 to 40 per cent of the bank — enough to establish controlling interest.

So far, only one group, headed by Otzar Hityshvut Hayehudim, the banking's holding company, coupled with foreign investors, has shown any inclination to take over.

Bidders must deposit $20 million to show how serious they really are.

Free Trade Across the Sinai

Israel and Egypt are working out the mechanics of a free trade agreement, which would cancel all customs duties on goods travelling between the two countries.

Not only that, but Egypt will be abolishing inconvenient trade regulations. For example, under current rules, Egyptian trucks carting products destined for Israel, must transfer them to an Israeli vehicle at the border and vice versa.

Egypt's minister of economics would also like to remove restrictions on Israeli companies participating in Egyptian government tenders.

He seems to be making progress. Egypt recently agreed to Israeli enterprises tendering for 50 per cent of the pipeline transferring natural gas to Israel.

Bigger Buildings in Jerusalem

Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert's master development plan for the capital includes larger buildings.

Downtown zoning regulations are going to be changed to permit construction of additional floors, which, Olmert feels will contribute to the city's revitalization.

Only low rises are allowed now, but the mayor may be looking at structures that are 14 or 15 stories high.

Olmert is also pushing for new roads, especially from the north, but he thinks a subway for Jerusalem is impractical.

The previous Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Yosef Y. Schneersohn, in 1929, as he arrives in the United States on his first visit to these shores. Inset: The present Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem M. Schneerson, with his father-in-law, in 1943.

Jewish communities around the globe will be celebrating the Rebbe's 92nd birthday on March 23, 11 Nissan. The Rebbe–his life and his leadership–continues to be the inspiration in the lives of millions who have dedicated themselves to the making of a kinder, gentler world for all of humankind. Since having suffered a stroke two years ago, the Rebbe has been making steady progress towards his recovery, and continues to share his counsel and blessings with thousands from all walks of life seeking his guidance. The following pages are dedicated in honor of the Rebbe's 92nd birthday.

Once again, the Chai Foundation has created with the panache of Madison Avenue and the purpose of a higher calling, this Passover poster, which will remind thousands of Jews to celebrate the upcoming holiday. Freedom: for Self, Society and Environment

Passover, as all other Jewish holidays, is not only a commemoration of a historic event, but it is also a time that is filled with opportunity and potential unique to this holiday.

EACH YEAR, AS WE PREPARE TO CELEBRATE Passover, the festival of freedom, we need to take the time to reflect on the significance of this celebration, particularly as it pertains to each of us in our personal lives. For Passover, as all other Jewish holidays, is not only a commemoration of a historic event, but it is also a time that is filled with opportunity and potential unique to this holiday.

The exodus from Egypt (in Hebrew Mitzraim—constraints), as it applies to our spiritual lives, refers to the ability of the individual to overcome negative habits and tendencies which inhibit the G-dly spark within him/her. In this way, the individual experiences freedom—the release from destructive and constraining inclinations.

Preparing the Jews to leave Egypt in haste, G-d commanded: "Your loins shall be girded; your shoes on your feet; your staff in your hand,"(Exodus, 12:11). As we know, there is intent and layers of meaning to each comment, word, even vowel in the Torah. Indeed, each of these expressions of readiness allude to the various areas of concern that constitute the whole person: Self, society and global environment.

Your loins girded. In the physical sense, the loins are the part of the body which support the whole body, including the head. Hence, the spiritual implication of "to gird one's loins" is to prepare to work energetically, towards self-perfection, in thought, speech and action.

Your shoes on your feet. Shoes enable the individual to walk on the ground, on a rough and prickly surface. This is not only for his/her own sake, but also to trod a path so that those who follow can walk easily. In spiritual terms, this refers to the individual's concern and involvement with other people and the surrounding society.

Your staff in your hand. The staff is a metaphor for the individual's influence on a global level. For the staff enables one to access what is otherwise beyond his/her reach. Thus we are encouraged to have impact upon the larger society, and perhaps upon those people with whom we have no direct contact. For, as each individual ought to think that "the world was created for his sake" (Talmud, Sanhedrin, 37a), every person must thus make his/her positive influence felt in the world at large.

Through the fulfillment of Torah and mitzvot, which manifest themselves in every aspect of individual and communal life, each one of us is thus able to integrate these three areas which constitute a wholesomeness in the spiritual quality of life.

May this holiday of Passover penetrate our lives in all respects, and bring redemption to every Jew, in spiritual and physical terms. With blessings for a happy, healthy and redemptive Passover. ◻

Lubavitch International extends thanks and appreciation to its friends around the world, whose prayers and good wishes continue to pour forth. They are a source of strength to the Rebbe in his continued progress to recovery.

50 Years Later: America Is Indeed No Different

MARCH 1940. A SWEDISH liner, the Drottingholm, plows across the Atlantic, swarming with U-boats, on the last commercial transport to cross the ocean before the shipping ban of W.W.II.

Distinguished passenger, Rabbi Yosef Yitzchak Schneersohn, the previous Lubavitcher Rebbe, reeling from the grief and pain of Eastern European Jewry's devastation, was planning a counter-offensive even before the ship was within sight of its destination. While in his cabin, the Rebbe was preparing plans for a network of Jewish schools, activities and institutions in the United States. Later, when the ship docked at New York harbor, the Rebbe addressed a crowd of Jewish and political VIPs who had come to greet him. "Your warm and cordial reception is deeply moving," he said. "But, my heart is overwhelmed with pain and concern for the plight of our brethren on the other side. Their cry for help echoes in my ears and heart. . . . America's conscience must be awakened, and above all, American Jewry must alert itself to the life-saving mission now on its hands as never before in the history of mankind."

Pioneer of the Jewish day school system: Rabbi Yosef Yitzchak Schneersohn in his stateroom aboard the Drottingholm on the day of his arrival to the United States, March 19, 1940.

Six days later, Yeshivah Tomchei Tmimim Lubavitch had opened in Brooklyn, New York, and then a younger division, Achei Tmimim. Shortly thereafter, the Rebbe initiated the opening of yeshivas and Talmud Torahs in other Jewish enclaves in the New York area. Despite strong opposition from the Jewish community, particularly the established Jewish organizations, the Rebbe dispatched emissaries throughout the northeast to open Talmud Torahs for public school children, elementary school yeshivas, and summer learning programs.

The momentum picked up in 1941, particularly with the expanded programs of the present Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem M. Schneerson. Upon his arrival to the U.S., the Rebbe was immediately appointed by his father-in-law, Rabbi Yosef Yitzchak Schneersohn, to establish Merkos L'inyonei Chinuch, the educational arm, and Machne Israel, the all-embracing social services arm of the Lubavitch movement.

The Jewish day school was soon becoming a choice for many modern Jewish parents, and Lubavitch was opening Jewish day schools in cities and states across the country.

As the pioneer of the Jewish day school system in the United States, Lubavitch found itself up against the terrific odds of the prevalent Jewish mentality. This was, after all, a generation that wanted desperately to distance itself from "old world" Jewish associations. At the time, few Jews determined to produce doctors and lawyers in their new land of infinite possibilities, could accept that it need not be at the expense of one's Jewish identity. The sight of Chasidic Jews wearing their identities unabashedly—coming along to open parochial schools in the United States, was perceived by many Jews as a throwback to a primitive past, and a disconcerting threat to their successful integration into the great American melting pot. Even within the Torah-observant American Jewish community, content with their small enclaves and small yeshivas, there was

"America's conscience must be awakened, and above all, American Jewry must alert itself to the life-saving mission now on its hands as never before in the history of mankind."

No opposition would dampen the Rebbe's determination to prevent yet another form of Jewish annihilation from occurring on the American continent.

resistance to the Rebbe's bold and comprehensive vision for the American Jewish reality. However, with the specter of the Holocaust on the European continent being so grave, no opposition would dampen the Rebbe's determination to prevent yet another form of Jewish annihilation from occurring on the American continent.

"America is no different," the Rebbe proclaimed. "It must become the new center for Torah and Judaism." So, with very little resources or financial support from American Jewish organizations, small yeshivas were opening in the back rooms of synagogues, and in basements and attics of private houses. Reluctantly, many parents agreed to send their children to these yeshivas at first, if only because of the secular studies they offered.

Slowly but surely, as the Rebbe and his emissaries succeeded to fan the moribund sparks of Jewish identity in the United States, the yeshivas began to grow. Slowly but surely, through the painstaking and entirely selfless devotion of select individuals, "the ice of American Jewry," was beginning to melt. Slowly but surely the yeshivas were making their point: Jewish education was a priori. And here, in the United States, a Torah education with strong Jewish values was not incompatible with a fine secular education. Jewish identity should and indeed would be a source of pride.

Fifty years later, Jewish day schools have become the norm, indeed fashionable. The success of Lubavitch in the field of Jewish education is measured not only in the numbers of schools it has established nationwide or in the numbers of proud and committed Jews it has produced, but in the way it has shaped the attitudes of American Jews. Today, most Jewish communities boast a Jewish day school. Today, every Jewish parent, regardless of affiliation, takes an unmistakable pride in giving his/her child a Jewish education.

Pittsburgh, New Haven, Springfield, Rochester, Boston, Bridgeport, Newark, Chicago Worcester . . . These were among the first yeshivas to be opened in the early years following the late Rebbe's arrival in New York. In the following pages, Lubavitch International takes a look at one of these yeshivas across the span of fifty years: It is but one example of how faith, conviction and commitment have come together to save generations of Jewish souls and to clear the path for generations more to follow.

Fifty Years of Growth

THEN: Ms. Keny Posner (Deren) with her young charges.

Mrs. Frieda Unger: "Very much depended on a few people who started it."

Mrs. Ethel Weiss: "I made the lunches."

Mrs. Rose Dunn: "Rabbi Posner came to see us, and he said, 'The Rebbe sent me to start a yeshiva. And you're coming along to help, aren't you?'"

Mrs. Rose Balsam: "Rabbi Posner came to my house and would not take no for an answer."

FOUR WOMEN, ALL WELL into their nineties today, share vignettes of half a century ago. It was September, 1943. Rabbi Sholom Posner climbed the wooden staircase with four young children trailing after him. He led them to their classroom, up in an attic apartment on Dawson Street. With patience, diligence and love, he taught them the Hebrew Aleph-Bet. Then the first word of the Torah, B'reishit.

In the beginning, Yeshiva Achei Tmimim was very, very small. There was no fanfare, no groundbreaking ceremonies, no press releases, no photo ops, no endowments. Just a couple of Jewish kids who needed to learn how to live as Jews, and a husband and wife team who were ready to teach them. There were also these four mothers who never regretted their decision to put their sons into the hands of Rabbi Posner.

Yeshiva Achei Tmimim, more commonly known as Yeshiva Schools, celebrates fifty years of growth this year, with an enrollment of nearly 500 students ranging from nursery through high school, including a boy's yeshiva. In the course of half a century, the Yeshiva has become the largest, the most respected and arguably the most successful Jewish day school in Pittsburgh. Located in Squirrel Hill, the yeshiva's well-planned building, equipped with computers, science labs, and audio-video facilities, is a far cry from the attic room of 1943. But a closer look at the Yeshiva, its teachers, its ambiance, and the graduates it turns out year after year, are evidence that the essential qualities invested by Rabbi Posner, who has been with the school until recently, have remained intact.

"Pittsburgh would not be Pittsburgh without the Yeshiva. People now move to Pittsburgh because of our Yeshiva education," insists Mrs. Dunn. Rabbi Yisroel

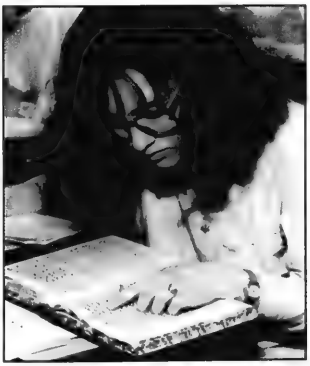
NOW: The modern, 13-year-old school building is bursting at the seams.

"Pittsburgh would not be Pittsburgh without the Yeshiva."



Gary Yon

Senior student, Shira Green, grapples with a Biblical passage.

Rosenfeld, Dean of the Yeshiva, concurs. "There are quite a number of families who have chosen to settle in Pittsburgh in recent years because of what our school offers." He credits a public school strike in the early 70s for bringing a wave of new students to the school. "Before that, many Jewish parents had the misconception that the school only served children from observant homes." The strike caused them to take a closer look at the school, bringing the Yeshiva an additional 100 students who chose to stay after the strike was over. "Parents quickly realized that the school, with its outstanding secular studies department, meets the educational expectations of a cross-section of the Jewish community —as is reflected in the make-up of our student body," says Rabbi Rosenfeld. Indeed, the SAT scores of students at Yeshiva Schools rank in the highest percentile nationwide. Enjoying a wide reputation for its success, Yeshiva Schools high school has been the choice of students from across the country, many of whom go on to study at universities around the country, or higher yeshivas around the world.

In spite of the Yeshiva's rapid growth, classes have been kept to the near ideal size of about 15 students per teacher. Rabbi Rosenfeld sees the school as an integral part of the community. "The school involves the students in many community activities so that in addition to their academic growth, they develop a sense of commitment and responsibility to their community." Conversely, "in many respects the school sets the tone for the broader Jewish community," he observes.

"People realize that this type of education is not only central to know where they came from, but to know where they are going."

HIGHER EDUCATION: A class of thrilled kindergarten graduates.

Enjoying a relationship of shared mutual interests, the Yeshiva and the United Jewish Federation have long been working together for the community's welfare. "When my first granddaughter began preschool at the Yeshiva, I must admit that I was a bit skeptical," confesses Mr. Jesse Cohen, past president of the UJF. "Now that I have watched her grow and mature into the caring, intelligent and Jewishly-committed young woman she is today, I am convinced that the Yeshiva and its emphasis on Jewish values and knowledge are largely responsible. It is truly a joy for me to see her brothers and sisters following in her footsteps."

As the yeshiva marks its jubilee, it is also promising to expand further: "The building we built in 1981 for the girls' division," explains Rabbi Rosenfeld, "was planned for 150 students." Now bursting at its seams with 250 students in the building, "it is time to expand the facility." The Yeshiva is also negotiating the purchase of a new building for the boys division, currently occupying space in two synagogues.

How is it that the Yeshiva continues to enjoy such a high rate of annual growth? "I guess there is a feeling that people want to know where they came from," says William Rudolph, president of the board at the Yeshiva. "People realize that this type of education will not only help them learn about where they came from, but also where they are going."

And they are going good places at the Yeshiva, where the time-honored Chabad-Lubavitch values that place Jewish children—their education, their Jewish pride, their optimism and the fulfillment of their potential—at the top of every agenda, are now, as then, the hallmark of Achei Tmimim Yeshiva Schools. ◘

Saturday Night the Rabbi Stayed Out

STREET BEAT: The Mitzvah Mobile takes to the London streets.

EVERY SATURDAY NIGHT, RABBI Levi Sudak can be seen "hanging out" on a street corner in the upper northwest part of London with hundreds of Jewish teenagers. At first, it may seem as though the rabbi is rediscovering his inner child. However, as he carries on his conversations with these kids, the dynamics between teenagers and rabbi become clear.

An enigma to some, a noisy nuisance to others, this phenomenon of Jewish kids "hanging out" was a cause for concern among many community members who perceived them as a potential danger to the community.

The Chabad-Lubavitch representative of Edgware, Rabbi Levi Sudak, saw it otherwise. "They were not hostile or violent in any way," he explains. "The danger was really about losing all these children to the influences of the street, to assimilation and other negative elements."

So one Saturday night, arriving with a havdalah set, snacks and good ideas, Rabbi Sudak joined the kids. His style caught the youths off-guard, and they quickly warmed up to him. Since 1986,

As night falls, Rabbi Sudak swings into action.

The Street Youth Project has turned the characteristic aimlessness of these Saturday night hangouts into a meaningful and productive experience. Parked on the street all night long is a Mitzvah Mobile stocked with good reading material, drinks and snacks. Through a variety of activities and speakers who have come to address them, most recently Jonathan Sacks, Chief Rabbi of England, the teenagers have begun to take a more serious look at themselves and the direction they want to take in life.

"Our relationship with these kids extends way beyond our Saturday night meetings," says Rabbi Sudak, who adapted parts of the Edgware Chabad House to serve the teenagers. A youth lounge, a game room with pool tables, electronic and other games, and round the clock refreshments are always available to them. "The kids know that this is a place that is always open to them. There is always someone available with a listening ear. They feel welcome to use the facilities, and come and go as they please," he says.

The rapport between Chabad and the teenagers is so successful, Rabbi Sudak admits, that it "is not uncommon that we get called in middle of the night by the police to help out if one of them is in trouble."

Although many of these kids' parents would prefer to deny that their children are among this large group, one parent did say that "Chabad is the only organization that has been able to find a positive direction for these teenagers, and has been extraordinarily successful."

In recognition of Rabbi Sudak's Street Youth Project, the Chief Rabbi presented Chabad of Edgware with an award. In his presentation, Rabbi Sacks said, "It is important for us as a community to know that you are there giving them that support." ◻

Chai to Thai

THE TRAFFIC CRAWLS AT A pace slower than Manhattan's rush hour, the air is denser than LA's smog, and the oppressive heat is incessant. In Bangkok, finding an elephant on the road or being delayed in traffic because the king is visiting, are all in an ordinary day's experience. So, too, are the mega-deals that are cut every hour as precious gems change hands, attracting foreign businessmen to this Buddhist metropolis in Thailand.

It was not the lure of business that drew Yosef and Nechama Kantor to Bangkok. Rather, it was a Jewish community of about 200 families in need of Jewish revitalization that had them packing their bags last May, as they said good-bye to the comforts of family and home in California.

Although the Kantors found two synagogues serving Bangkok's Jewish community, neither had a rabbi. The two rabbis preceding Rabbi Kantor lasted only several months. "During the Vietnam war, the community had a succession of rabbis stationed here to serve the U.S. troops," explained Ruth Gerson, a congregant. "But in 1974 that stopped, and we've had many temporary people, and sometimes no one at all." When the leaderless congregation requested help from Chabad-Lubavitch last Chanukah, Lubavitch Headquarters sent Rabbi Kantor to visit the community for several weeks. As a result, Rabbi Kantor now fills the position of rabbi in both these synagogues, while also acting as the schochet (ritual slaughterer), making kosher poultry available to the local community.

In the six months they have been there, the Kantors have dramatically raised the level of Jewish awareness, commitment and activity. Upon their arrival, only a few women made use of the mikvah. As a result of Mrs. Kantor's women's study programs, the use of the mikvah has grown six-fold. Through dynamic educational programs and study groups (which include daily adult educational classes, holiday celebrations, Shabbatons and a Talmud Torah serving some 30 children), in a city where no Jewish school previously existed, Bangkok's Jewish community is quickly shaping up.

"The bottom line," says Mrs. Kantor, "is education." Its absence, in any form, zeros in on the essential void of Bangkok's Jewish community. "All the Jewish children here go to British or other International schools. They have had absolutely no Jewish education while in Bangkok." The Talmud Torah, where Mrs. Kantor teaches, is a first in formal Jewish education in Bangkok. And that's only a beginning. Next, Mrs. Kantor is preparing to open a preschool.

As Chabad representatives to Thailand, the Kantors have responded to the needs of a transient Jewish element in the country: Jewish business people, many of them in need of kosher food and Shabbat accommodations, and Israeli youth just out of the army. Because of its cheap travel deals, Thailand serves as a starting point for those Israelis who regularly go backpacking in the Himalayas upon completing their army service.

Rabbi Yosef and Nechama Kantor, with their daughter Chaya Mushka.

An estimated 30,000 Israelis pass through Bangkok each year. "Many of these soldiers are so far removed from any true Jewish identity, that Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur are simply ordinary days for them. Others, vulnerable because of their ignorance about Judaism, become involved in Buddhism. "We're fast becoming an address for parents of Israeli kids who are going off the deep end," says Rabbi Kantor, who has managed to pluck some innocent Jewish souls from the quicksand of Eastern religions.

Rabbi Kantor was ordained by the Central Lubavitch Yeshiva in NY. Mrs. Kantor (nee Schmukler) is from Los Angeles, California. Their daughter, Chaya Mushka is one year old. ◻

Old Traditions in New Mexico

SHOPPERS AT THE CORONADO Center, New Mexico's largest shopping center, were surprised to find a huge Chanukah menorah lighting up the mall during the eight days of Chanukah. On the first night of Chanukah, latkes and dreidels made the rounds as parents and children were entertained.

"This is one way that we can bring the Jewish population here a sense of the joy and pride that goes along with being Jewish," says Rabbi Chaim Schmukler, the director of Chabad Lubavitch activities in New Mexico since September 1992.

Holiday programs, a pre-school, Shabbat meals, adult education classes, campus activities, and more—these are all the details, explains Rabbi Schmukler, that contribute significantly to a heightened Jewish consciousness. Both he and his wife Devorah Leah, describe their objectives simply: "We're here to reach out to all Jews, and let them know that regardless of their level of affiliation, knowledge or identity, a Jew is a Jew is a Jew, even here in New Mexico."

For now, the Schmukler home doubles as a Chabad House where Shabbat services and meals are held. Rabbi Schmukler notes that it is often the small things that make big differences in the attitudes and perceptions that many people have about Judaism. "Many of the people whom we've encountered here had very vague ideas about Judaism," he says. "Some of the people who've been with us for Shabbat never knew what challah was, or what something as rudimentary as Shabbat candles were."

With a high intermarriage rate, that shouldn't be surprising. It is an arduous undertaking, but the Schmuklers want to address these problems at their root: making a solid Jewish education available to the Jewish children of Albuquerque and beyond. "We want the kind of education that will foster a positive and proud Jewish identity," says Rabbi Schmukler. This explains why one of their first projects was the opening of a preschool for a handful of children. This was soon followed by an after-school program. In addition, the holiday programs like the Chanukah menorah in the mall, the shofar factory, sukkah mobile, Jewish art show and "Dial a Jewish Story" are making their imprints on the minds of young public school children. "We want these children not only to learn Jewish history, tradition and practices, but to discover the joys and beauty that go along with the holidays," says Mrs. Schmukler.

A Shabbat, holiday and Sunday minyan, a FAX-of-LIFE service that brings Torah lessons to the corporate tables in the city, a Talmud class for university students, a women's study class on Jewish Law and the Prophets, and a Kabbalah class for beginners—these are some of the programs that the Schmuklers hope will not only enhance the level of Jewish awareness, but will also create a warm community atmosphere as they set out to build a proud and visible Jewish presence in Albuquerque.

That's a tall order for a city like Albuquerque, where there is no kosher meat shop, and there are no kosher restaurants. "Kosher food must become more available here. In this day and age, a Jew should not have a difficult time maintaining a kosher home because kosher food is not easily available," observes Mrs. Schmukler.

Devorah Leah Schmukler (nee Perlow) studied at Beth Rivkah in New York, and completed her Teacher's Certification at the Lubavitch teacher's seminary in Sydney, Australia. Rabbi Schmukler, from Montreal, grew up in Los Angeles and was ordained at the Central Lubavitch Yeshiva in New York.

A TIME TO BUILD

New Lubavitch Facility in Charlotte

"As the parent, I was the only one who could decide which preschool program was best suited for my child. I sought and chose a school that specializes in the well-being of children."

LAST DECEMBER, THE CHARLOTTE, North Carolina Jewish community celebrated the Bar Mitzvah year of Chabad–Lubavitch, and the groundbreaking of a 2.6 million dollar facility on several acres of wooded grounds. A building of 20,000 square feet will become the center for all of the institutions and activities that Chabad-Lubavitch has brought to Charlotte. Among these are the Lubavitch Day School, preschool, shul, mikvah, adult education center, and Talmud Torah.

"This is where it'll all be happening," says Rabbi Yossi Groner of the new complex. The building will include 16 classrooms, a gym, kitchen, dining facilities and sleeping accommodations for guests at Chabad–Lubavitch's twice monthly Shabbaton weekends. Rabbi Groner and his wife Mariashi, the Lubavitch representatives to the Carolinas and sticklers for quality, expect the building to be ready for the 1994–95 school year.

The Lubavitch Jewish Day School, acknowledged by the local media for its high standards and quality education, has an enrollment of students that run the gamut from fully observant to non-affiliated. One mom, interested in all aspects of the early educational experience of her child, explained her selection process for a pre-school. With an eye for teacher-child interaction, positive reinforcement, the variety of developmentally appropriate activities and materials, the experience and abilities of the teachers and the emphasis on experiential learning, she observed a variety of pre-schools. She then made her decision for the Lubavitch Pre-School. "As the parent," she says, "I was the only one who could decide which preschool program was best suited for my child. I sought and chose a school that specializes in the well-being of children."

Emphasizing the nature of the growth and success of the Jewish community in Charlotte, Mrs. Groner says: "Thirteen years ago, there was only one Jewish day school in Charlotte." But that school closed a short while later, and there was little in this city, then of 4000 Jews, that could sustain, let alone enhance, Jewish education and identity.

"When you consider that today we have 135 children in our Day School, 250 people at Simchat Torah, a vibrant minyan four times weekly, 50 children in our after-school programs, daily adult education classes and summer camps of more than 100 children—you realize how much has been accomplished in such a short span of time," she says.

With its broad variety of programs serving children, adults, teenagers and public-school children, Chabad-Lubavitch has penetrated the entire Jewish community. It has infused it with a vibrancy and pride that makes Charlotte a desirable place for Jewish families. The community has since expanded—its population doubling to 8000.

Rabbi Groner, who also serves on the rabbinical committee of the Jewish Federation, talks of people who were influential is supporting the work of Lubavitch. It is former State Senator Marshall Rauch and Herman Blumenthal who were the initial contributors to Lubavitch and who continue to lend their support and encouragement to the work of Chabad Lubavitch. The Wojnowich-Kaplan families along with Marvin Baron and Jerry Hannes launched the new building project.

The Groners attribute much of Chabad's success in Charlotte to the dedication of local emissaries, Rabbi and Mrs. Binyomin Weiss, who have contributed greatly to the growth of all Lubavitch programs since joining seven years ago, as well as Rabbi and Mrs. Eli Rosenfeld, who have recently joined the team. One success has led to another, prompting the opening of additional Chabad centers in Raleigh, and in Myrtle Beach and Columbia, South Carolina. Taking their cue from the Charlotte Headquarters, the Chabad-Lubavitch representatives are producing similar results, making Lubavitch of the Carolinas a pillarof support within its Jewish Community.

The new building portends continued growth for the Charlotte Jewish community. The Groners, grateful for past achievements, but not content, maintain that "there's still a long way to go."

Eighteen Years in South Africa's Mother City

Students of the Hebrew Academy, Cape Town's only Torah school. The school grounds are nestled in the foothills of scenic Table Mountain.

IT WAS 4:00 A.M. ON TISHA B'AV, the saddest day on the Jewish calendar, when Rabbi Mendel Popack was awakened by the police at his home in Sea Point, a suburb of Cape Town, South Africa.

"Your synagogue is ablaze," they told him.

The Cape Jewish Chronicle put it this way: "The ninth of Av, 3338, fire destroys our Temple; the ninth of Av, 3828, fire destroys our second Temple; the ninth of Av, 5752, fire destroys our miniature Temple."

The tragedy of the Chabad House consumed by flames on Tisha B'Av struck a chord deep within all elements of the Cape Town Jewish community. "History," said Rabbi Popack, "had become the Chabad House's reality."

Established in 1984, the Chabad House had since served the Jewish community not only as a synagogue, Jewish educational, activity and outreach center for thousands of Cape Town Jews, but as a particularly warm and welcoming home for all of the community's Jews. It stood as a symbol of Jewish renewal in a city where the dearth of spiritual substance was perhaps as striking as its scenic landscapes.

Rabbi Popack and his wife, Avi, have taken strength, however, reading into the flames of the fire a call to move forward. "Once again," said Rabbi Popack shortly after the fire, "from a house we will make a home."

Recalling their arrival in 1976 to Cape Town, Avigail Popack describes a superbly organized community with a strong united front. "But there was very little Jewish substance here," she recalls. To use a mikvah, Avi had to travel to Johannesburg, some 1400 miles away. "It was not easy to overcome the initial resistance of the communal powers-that-be to the establishment of a community mikvah," she says.

The community lay leaders perceived the mikvah as an archaic tradition, not one they were keen on introducing to the Cape Town Jewish community. After four years, swimming upstream all the way, the Popacks prevailed and what is perhaps the most beautiful mikvah in all of South Africa, Mikvah Aaron, was built. The mikvah is used today by some 100 women.

As with the mikvah, the Popacks have met tremendous resistance when trying to establish a Jewish school. "The only Jewish school here had almost no Jewish studies curriculum at all," says Rabbi Popack. Expressing its Jewish identity almost entirely in terms of its Zionist ideology, it left a void that needed to be filled. "We really felt that there was a pressing need for a school that would bring Judaism, real Torah and mitzvot into the lives of its students."

Once again, having surmounted enormous difficulties, Rabbi and Mrs. Popack opened the Hebrew Academy of Cape Town with 12 students spread thin over a first, second and fourth grade. That was in 1983. Now, eleven years later, under the principalship of Rabbi Shlomo Lazarus the school has an enrollment of almost 100 and extends from nursery through 9th grade. With an outstanding Jewish and secular studies program, students graduate with entrenched Torah values. As the school expanded, it moved from one facility to another, until several months ago, the government made a gift of the building to the Academy in recognition of its outstanding work.

Attributing its success in part to Chabad's emphasis on working within the community structure, Avi explains, "We respect the community organization, and make every effort to integrate all of our ideas and activities with them." As co-founder and vice chairlady of NECHAMA, a social service organization for bereavement counseling, Avi has helped bring together people from diverse backgrounds and affiliations within the Jewish community, offering support and professional counseling to those suffering from emotional trauma. KOCOSA, another group of which Mrs. Popack serves as board member, is designed to create consumer awareness of Kosher products. These, and a women's Book Club in which women meet once a month to discuss Jewish literature are important if the city is to grow in a healthy and dynamic way, Avi argues.

While housed in a temporary facility until a new complex (that will accommodate all of Chabad's Cape Town institutions and services) is completed, Chabad-Lubavitch of Cape Town has in no way put the brakes on its activities. "To the contrary," says Rabbi Popack, "our outreach activities have taken on a greater urgency." That means that the 250 offices and 800 families who have come to expect their weekly fax-fed Torah thoughts are still getting them. And the 5000 Jews who know that Chabad remembers them on Purim with a Shalach Manot package, will not be disappointed.

Avigail Popack reflects thoughtfully about her nearly two decades in Cape Town. "Our children have really sacrificed. They've given of themselves selflessly and felt very isolated at times. I see them as little ambassadors."

Indeed, during their early years there, the Popacks often felt isolated as they watched the Jewish "neshamas" they've befriended bid their adieus and depart for more established Jewish cities. Frustrating but inevitable, the Popacks knew that any Jew whose soul caught the flame would have to move on to a community that could better help them in their spiritual growth.

But that's changed today, says Rabbi Popack, as a result of 18 years of building a dynamic Torah community. "Many of the people who become involved in Yiddishkeit today have the option of staying on." And they do.

Rabbi Lazarus and his wife Yonah, a native of South Africa, are one example. Having come from a secular background, Yonah's journey to Jewish discovery was sparked when she met up with the Popacks. After studying at yeshivas in New York and Israel, she then returned to Cape Town as a newlywed. She and her husband turned all their efforts towards helping Chabad build the Jewish community. In addition to their involvement in the school, the Lazaruses serve the Milnerton Jewish community, Cape Town's fastest growing Jewish suburban community. Also on staff at the Chabad House in Cape Town are Kalman and Nicole Green, coordinating the Torah educational programs.

Always growing, Chabad of Cape Town has extended beyond the city to the suburb of Constantia, where Lubavitch representative Rabbi Yossi Chaikin is the community rabbi and Jewish Studies Director of the Jewish school there.

December and summertime in South Africa. The V&A Waterfront, Cape Town's newest and most beautiful development with shops, entertainment and amusement on the waterfront is a hot spot drawing visitors and locals. It is also the first night of Chanukah, and more than 50,000 people will make their way over to the Chanukah Fair and Festival at the Waterfront. Kosher food, music, concerts and amusement will carry on into the night, as dreidels spin and the Chanukah flames of the grand menorah light up the night skies.

"Chanukah at the Waterfront is truly the Jewish event of the year," said Rabbi Popack. The Chanukah Fair and Festival was conceived at the prompting of the Waterfront after Chabad-Lubavitch brought a menorah on a boat onto the pier one Chanukah. The following year Chabad was approached with the request that they plan a major Chanukah event on the Waterfront. "The year ended in a blaze of glory," wrote the Cape Jewish Chronicle. "And it all happened at the Waterfront [with the] grand Lubavitch Chanukah celebrations."

Coordinated by Kalman Green and his team of fifty volunteers, the Menorah illuminated Cape Town with its lights and its message of Jewish pride.

Inward Bound

The catch of the day: City slickers with visiting Rabbi Yosef Posner, of Skokie, Illinois.

MICHAEL WEISS, AN INVESTMENT BANKER from North Carolina, is always game for the wild outdoors. Last summer, he and a friend decided to try Inward Bound, a wholly new concept in camping.

It is the backdrop of pristine Boundary Waters Canoe Area, which comprises a million acres of forests, lakes and streams on Minnesota's northern border, that Inward Bound participants discover the harmony between man, nature and G-d.

With no motor-powered vehicles, no planes, nor electrical power or telephone connections, this carefully guarded ecosystem allows the sounds of prayers, Chasidic melodies, chirping of the birds and crackling firewood to blend into a sweet medley.

Canoeing, fishing, and camping in these great outdoors, davening under the skies with a minyan (ten campers per Inward Bound trip), studying Torah, exploring metaphysical questions and listening to Chasidic stories around a campfire, make the Inward Bound experience as spiritually enriching as it is physically invigorating.

Describing his experience, Mike spoke of it as "invaluable and inspirational." Mr. Weiss was especially grateful for getting to spend the days with the noted Chasidic lecturer, Rabbi Manis Friedman, the rabbi joining the campers on this particular trip. Each trip features another Chasidic rabbi who joins the campers and brings unique inspiration. "I felt very fortunate to have him there for four days during which we discussed so many things. His presence there really rounded out the whole experience," he says.

"Getting away from it all," explains Rabbi Moshe Kasowitz, the founder and director of Inward Bound, "should leave you refreshed as a whole person, body and mind, soul and spirit."

Offered throughout the summer to Jewish men of all ages and affiliations, the five-day camping trips provide campers with everything short of their blue jeans. Outfitted with fishing, camping and canoeing gear, and with three kosher gourmet meals daily, campers have a truly hassle-free experience. "I'm an avid camper," says Mr. Weiss, "and I can tell you that Rabbi Kasowitz has a great system going. He really knows what he's doing."

Now in its fifth year, Inward Bound a project of Chabad-Lubavitch of the Upper Midwest, is hoping to create a parallel program for women this summer. If the success of the men's program—booked months in advance by word of mouth—is any indication, Rabbi Kasowitz expects the women's trips to be just as successful. ◻

A Moving Museum

"We are always looking for the kinds of programs that will bring together the entire Jewish community."

FLASHING STROBE lights cast streams of light; torrential rains pour down before your eyes; the sun, the moon and iridescent planets appear; plants, trees and grass emerge, then animals, and slowly, you come face to face with your own reflection.

Countdown to tomorrow: The universal mitzvah clock exhibit.

In a dramatic diorama, the Genesis story is recreated. The children of the Talmud Torahs and Hebrew day schools in thirty cities around the country begin a compelling historical journey here. They wind their way through exhibits of the highs and lows of Jewish history; the Jewish life cycle and the progress of the world. The last of the eight exhibits, a clock of various mitzvot operating by weights and running water, allows children to test the effects of the good deeds they perform. With each mitzvah the visitor does, the water begins to run, accelerating the ticking of the clock. The clock strikes a chord with the children, who pick up on the message: There is a purpose to it all, and every child can contribute to the fulfillment of the Jewish dream—the long-awaited redemption—through his or her acts of goodness.

Video theaters, game shows and workshops—all with Jewish themes—are part of the 10,000 square foot exhibit currently touring the United States. Electronics, robotics, computers, and multi-screen projections make the dozens of displays and dioramas especially appealing to multi-media savvy children. Competing for their attention against the allure of computer games, interactive video and movies, Jewish educators face the challenge of finding newer and more appealing ways to communicate values, traditions and Jewish history to their students. This is a challenge well known to Chabad-Lubavitch emissaries, for whom Jewish education in their respective communities is a primary concern. The Great Jewish Experience, a project of the Shluchim Office—a central resource center for Lubavitch emissaries and Chabad Houses worldwide—was developed in response to this need. "We wanted to help the emissaries do something on a major scale to educate Jewish youth and their respective communities, particularly about Moshiach," says Rabbi Mendy Sharfstein, exhibit coordinator. At a cost that ran into the hundreds of thousands of dollars and would require substantial resources of talent and manpower, the project was clearly beyond the scope of a single Chabad-Lubavitch center. Funding for the project, notes Shluchim Office Director Rabbi Gedalya Shemtov, came from Mr. Leonard Abramson, founder and CEO of US Healthcare, and a member of the national cabinet of American Friends of Lubavitch.

Conceptually, this museum is fashioned after the new wave institutions that are not based on collections, but rather seek to dramatize events or to trace the development and influence of a particular people or phenomenon. Unlike all of these, however, this museum was designed and constructed with maximum efficiency for assembling, dismantling and transporting the entire exhibit from place to place.

Transported in two tractor trailer trucks, the exhibit began its circuit last October and spends between one to two weeks in scheduled cities. In addition to locating a site large enough to accommodate the exhibit, the Chabad representative of each interested community assumes responsibility for making all the local arrangements and publicity. As an event that appeals to all elements and all Jewish institutions of most communities, many Chabad Houses enjoy the cooperation of the local Jewish Communities Centers and other community institutions.

For Rabbi Benzion Geisinsky, Chabad-Lubavitch representative of Potomac, Maryland, the Great Jewish Experience was just the kind of project he dreamt of. "We are always looking for the kind of program that will bring together the entire Jewish community," he says. Rabbi Geisinsky saw this happen the week before Chanukah, as schools and temples from Montgomery County and the Washington and Maryland suburbs visited the museum. "More than anything else," says Rabbi Geisinsky, "I think this exhibit demonstrates that Lubavitch is one of the most creative forces in Jewish education today." Not only was the Experience an educational success, it was also a success in bringing the community together. "We had virtually all schools involved," he says. Commenting on the Experience, Marian Oswhega, principal of the Bethesda Jewish Congregation said, "Our continuing experience with Chabad is one which strengthens our feelings of dedication to the principles of unconditional love for Klal Yisrael." ◻

BEHIND THE SCENES

Twenty young Rabbinical students, among them amateur artists, painters, carpenters, craftsmen, computer whizzes and electronic geniuses, applied themselves to this project with a single-mindedness that would dominate their lives for the next six months. They consulted with the professionals and worked from artists' and designers' sketches. "Had we gone to professionals," says Rabbi Sharfstein, "the cost of production would have reached one million dollars. With these young men, we saved substantially, and had the commitment and dedication not found with anyone else. What's more, we sacrificed nothing in terms of quality and professionalism."

Towards the end, the students found themselves racing against time. Moving into a huge Brooklyn warehouse where the Exhibit was being produced, they worked in shifts, pausing only for catnaps on cots they brought with them, and quick bites of kosher Chinese takeout food.

When the construction was finally completed, the work had only just begun. A crew of six students with mechanical and technical know-how, traveled along to assemble, operate and dismantle the Exhibit.

And so they continue from city to city with vigor and enthusiasm until the Great Jewish Experience completes its tour in the United States. "But hey, there's a whole world out there," Beryl Goldman, project director, says in a phone interview from Los Angeles, several days after the earthquake. "Why stop now?" Before the tour in the United States is over, plans will have been finalized for bringing the Museum to Canada, Europe, South America, Australia and Israel.

Lubavitch on the French Riviera

"L'ecole que j'aime —The school that I love"

RED TILED ROOFS AND STUCCO villas color the hilltops overlooking the French Riviera. The views of the horizon stretch up to the festival city of Cannes, where the glamour and glitter of movers and shakers never seem to wane. To the south is Monaco, a fairy-tale kingdom, with its very own royal family, and fortunes to be won or lost in the lure of its casinos.

We are sitting under the grapefruit tree on the terra cotta outside LeShem Shamayim restaurant, in Nice. The restaurant, opened by the Chabad-House, features a menu pleasing to French and Italian palates which converge on the Riviera. The restaurant enjoys a thriving patronage, not only of the Jewish community, but oddly, of a non-Jewish element as well.

Rabbi Yosef Hecht, director of the Chabad school, Kerem Menachem, and Mrs. Faygy Hecht, his associate and editor of the community's Chabad women's magazine, (she was born and raised in Tunis where her parents are still serving the Tunisian Jewish community as its only Chabad representatives) talk about Jewish life in the south of France. It does seem incredulous at first to find kosher restaurants, synagogues, mikvahs, and visibly observant Jews in this resort city. But, with a Jewish population of 35,000, Nice enjoys a burgeoning Jewish community.

Above the restaurant, the Chabad House is always bustling with activity. People stop in to join a minyan, or one of the daily classes conducted by Rabbi Yosef Pinson, the director of Chabad in Nice and Rabbi of the city's Ashkenazic community. It has been a particularly busy year, as Chabad has been celebrating its 18th anniversary here. The success of Chabad's efforts to invigorate the local Jewish community through all of the programs and activities it has introduced, are reasons to celebrate. There are daily activities, holiday programs, an overnight camp in the countryside, and ultimately, its outstanding educational institutions.

In the third grade language lab, furnished with state-of the-art audio facilities, students are hooked into their earphones as they practice conversational Hebrew. The seventh graders are practicing their breaststrokes in their weekly swim class, and the ninth graders are working the balance beam in the gym. It is school as usual for the 250 students of Kerem Menachem in Nice.

Kerem Menachem: The kindergarten in a majestic setting.

Mrs. Sara Pinson is the principal of the Hebrew department and founded the school in 1979. Together with her husband, she has guided the school with her vision, from its beginnings in a basement with five children to the present, where, it has blossomed into the most respected private school in Nice.

In a delightfully decorated facility, awash in sunlight that pours in through glass enclosed terraces, nurses care for the babies of the school's crèche, Rina Malka, named for the wife of philanthropist David Zimond. An adjacent building houses Kerem Menachem, the elementary and high school divisions.

"L'ecole que j'aime," "The school that I love" is more than just a motto for Kerem Menachem students. Many of them have grown with the school and reflect Mrs. Pinson's love of learning, her exuberance, and her determination to maximize the students' and the program potential. Always on the lookout for enhancing an already outstanding program, Mrs. Pinson consults with schools in Israel and the United States, maintaining the school's academic edge.

With parallel boys and girls classes through junior high school, Kerem Menachem serves a large segment of Nice and the surrounding area's Jewish population. A contract with the Board of Education puts very demanding standards on the school's curriculum. Among the extra-curricular activities the school provides, students can choose to enroll in a rigorous course of dance, drama, or acrobatics.

Success knows no limits, and Kerem Menachem is pushing ahead. An expanded building and a new kitchen facility are part of current renovations that will allow the school to accommodate a growing enrollment. "We hope to begin our 19th year," says Rabbi Pinson, "with renewed vitality and more ambitious projects." ◻

Bookmobile is much more than a Library on Wheels

HE'S THE RABBI WHO VISITS children at their afternoon schools in New Jersey's Morris and Essex counties, bringing them stories and songs and loads of books. They call him Rabbi Ben, and they wait eagerly for his trailer to pull onto the grounds of their afternoon school.

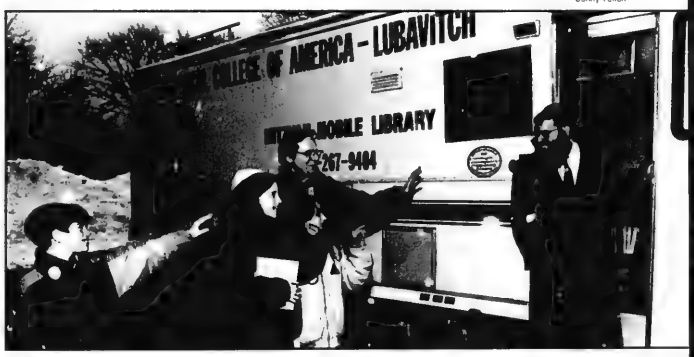
One by one the kids climb into this 40 foot-long mobile library, kiss the mezuzah, drop a coin into the charity box, and begin to choose from the thousands of books. Lively music plays in the background and cartoon videos are ready to roll.

But these books, stories, games and videos are different from those to which the children are accustomed. Colorful, stimulating and fun, they are also all Jewishly oriented."What we're doing here," explains Rabbi Benjamin Bresinger, "is educating our kids in an innovative way and offering them something that can compete with television."

The brainchild of Rabbi Baruch Klar, Director of Outreach at the Rabbinical College of America, this state-of-the-art library was converted from a mobile home, purchased with funds provided by the Bloom family of England.Of the 4,000 books in the mobile library, 60 percent are for children. 200 video tapes, 200 audio cassettes and numerous computer games give the children a wide range of choices.

The mobile library visits more than 30 of the schools in the Morris and Essex counties of New Jersey. Rabbi Bresinger, the Director of Educational Activities at the Rabbinical College, explains that this project, which tries to meet the needs of a variety of ages and backgrounds, packages a centuries old heritage of Jewish traditions and history in a modern and thoroughly appealing way. Modeled along the lines of the first Lubavitch Bookmobiles of the 60s, the mobile has a spacious, sleek, and smartly designed interior, with well planned niches for the various activities taking place—sometimes several at the same time.

Sunny Yellen



With the snow setting in, these patrons reluctantly bid farewell to Rabbi Bresinger and his bookmobile.

At first ambivalent about their schools participation in the project, the concerns of principals and teachers were quickly laid to rest. "They were impressed to see that the children were having great fun while learning about many aspects of Jewish tradition which they might otherwise not be exposed to," Rabbi Bresinger explained.

The success of the mobile library is reflected not only by the children's enthusiasm, but also by the rapport Rabbi Bresinger has developed with the schools, the faculty and the parents of these children. "The mobile library has been instrumental in creating a unity between us—regardless of our Jewish background," says Bresinger, who sees the mobile as a springboard for many other educational projects offered by the outreach division of the Rabbinical College. "We hope to enrich the Jewish experience of all these children by bringing a host of holiday programs that have gained nationwide popularity."Among the programs Rabbi Bresinger hopes to introduce are the Shofar Factory for Rosh Hashana, the Matzah Bakery for Passover, and the Olive Press for Chanukah.

Not only for children, the mobile has proven itself a wonderful resource for parents. As they come to collect their children, parents browse through shelves of new Jewish publications, and sit down for a chat with "Rabbi Ben" over a cup of coffee. It's here that they remind themselves of those mezuzot they've always been meaning to put up on their doors, the Jewish books they wanted for their library, and other such items. Rabbi Bresinger readily obtains these for them. "We want the entire Jewish community to enjoy the services we can provide through the mobile library," he says.

As the mobile library cruises quietly from school to school in the towns and cities of New Jersey's Morris and Essex counties, it's catching the attention of other Chabad outreach centers. Good ideas spread quickly in Lubavitch, and with this one it looks like the Jewish mobile library may become a familiar vehicle on the road to Jewish education. ◘

The Lights Triumph Once Again

OVER THE YEARS IT HAS BECOME COMMON, almost standard for Municipal, State and Federal Government properties, as well as public malls, squares and buildings to be adorned by one of the thousands of Chanukah Menorahs sponsored by Chabad-Lubavitch centers around the world. Standing tall, proud and bright, these Menorahs bring the light, warmth and joy of Chanukah to the many millions who chance upon them.

From the White House to the Champs Elyssés, from Central Park to Red Square these Menorahs have come to symbolize the religious freedom with which America is blessed and which it preserves and promotes around the world.

It has also become customary for various groups to legally challenge the presence of the Menorahs on public property. Cases were heard this year in record numbers in courts on every level, but all were resolved in favor of the continued presence of the Menorahs. The light of the Menorah continues to illuminate the world, dispelling the darkness and cold with the light and warmth of its flames, for all humankind.

Seder plate centrepiece of Pesach festival

By DR. FRED WEINBERG
Special to The CJN

The most important of the special ritual objects used on Passover eve on the festive table is the seder plate. In general, Jewish tradition strongly discourages ostentation even on holidays because the injunction to always be mindful of the destruction of the Temple tends to put a bit of a symbolic damper on happy occasions. For example, breaking a glass at a wedding or as was frequent in Europe in the previous century, leaving a corner of the wall of a room unpainted, again zaycher lechurbon — in remembrance of the destruction.

On Passover evening, however, rabbinic tradition makes it commendable to place all one's fine dishes on the table, even those not needed for the meal but strictly for their decorative effect. This is done in remembrance of the realization of national freedom.

The seder plate isn't all that old historically since there is no mention of it in any of the ancient literature such as the Talmud. The oldest mention of a seder plate isn't found until the Code of Jewish law appeared during the Middle Ages. There, one might observe mention of a basket container for the symbolic foods of Passover and the three special mazot. And indeed even today some Sephardi comunities continue to use a wicker basket as a seder plate.

As seder plates came into use, they were decorated by both Jewish and non-Jewish artists-craftsmen drawing upon the rich treasure of Jewish symbolism. The plates were decorated with first of all, the names and the symbolic foods of Passover placed in the traditional order. The shank bone, the egg, the charoset (i.e. dish of fruits, nuts and wine mixed to resemble mortar) and karpas (celery). Also maror (bitter herb) and hazeret (horseradish). Additional frequent favourite embellishments were biblical scenes from the story of the Exodus and Passover customs. Typically a Magen David (Star of David) motif or sometimes heraldic animals such as lions or stags were also present especially in Hungarian and other central European examples.

The style of the artwork depended to a great extent on the country in which the Jewish community lived. For example, in Italy and Spain the decorations were very grand and beautiful and some are even signed by the artist. In other countries, such as Germany and Hungary, porcelain factories turned out seder plates of varying style and the quality of porcelain was typical of that particular pottery. Featured in this article is the illustration of an unusual seder plate with French inscriptions.

Around the rim of the plate are seven black and white scenes copied by transfer printing from the Amsterdam Haggadah of 1695. These were originally copper engravings by the Christian convert Avraham bar Yaakov. Their subjects from central right and counter-clockwise are: Moses found in the bullrushes; the four Sons; Moses fighting the Egyptians. The French captions are very freely translated renderings of the Hebrew legends found beneath the scenes.

In the spaces between these scenes on the seder plate, the Four Questions are inscribed. In the centre of the plate on an intertwining scroll of stylized flowers and leaves is painted the word "Matzah" in beautiful large Hebrew script.
Ceramic seder plates form an interesting group in the Jewish religious artifacts and are important documentary material for studying the rituals of the Passover celebration and its related folklore in the various countries of the Jewish dispersion.

A time to take stock

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

This has been a troubling few weeks for us in the Jewish world.

A by-all-accounts caring and compassionate doctor snaps, and murders Arabs at prayer, and we all over the Jewish world are on the defensive. We fear reprisals, lock our doors, add security to our public institutions, screen our mail, and tell our children that here in Canada, we are safe. And hope that that is true.

Meanwhile, our brothers and sisters in the territories (and they are our brothers and sisters whether we agree with their ideological stance or not) are caught up in an increasing cycle of violence.

The Jews of Syria have - apparently — escaped a threatened pogrom, amid suggestions that even the threat was a shameless ruse by a leader angling for influence.

The Canadian Orthodox community, which has always considered itself as above such matters, has to face scandals by its own functionaries.

There seems little reason to be cheerful this Pesach.

On a personal level, we are all engrossed in the myriad preparations for Pesach, when even those ordinarily non-observant find themselves going slightly nuts as they clean, plan, shop and cook, all the while muttering "next year it will be different."

For our family, me especially, Pesach is even harder, as it is my first year coping with the holiday as a diabetic.

Now, as chronic conditions go, diabetes is not a bad one to have, at least according to most experts. (Doesn't that remind you of the doctor who informs the patient that he is not the least concerned about his high blood pressure, chronic bronchitis, enlarged prostate and bunions? To which the patient replies, "Doctor, if you had high blood pressure, bronchitis, enlarged prostate and bunions I wouldn't be worried either.")

Now, I have gotten myself in order, watching my diet like a hawk, losing weight, and seriously planning to exercise. (I never said I am perfect.)

My family has been incredibly supportive. One daughter, upon learning of my diagnosis, marched downstairs to the encyclopedia, read all about it, then brought home every pamphlet she could find in the drug store, along with an application for the Canadian Diabetes Society, which she sternly informed me I was to join.

Another daughter reminded me that I am not fighting alone, as everyone in the family loves me and will help me, an incredibly touching thing to be told, even though, coming from a teenager, it makes one seriously question if one is not hallucinating.

Personal upheavals

My oldest daughter, probably the most intense of my children, has courageously tried to both hide her own concern from me, and deal with her own personal upheavals without adding to my struggles.

My husband, whose obsession with Pesach preparations have graced several of these editorials, is earnestly studying the halachic requirements of the seder for diabetics, while at the same time manfully controlling both his temper and his excesses, at least when I can see them.

And my wonderful sister-in-law, informed me sternly (everyone is being very stern — there must be a column in that somewhere) that she would do her sister-in-law-ly duty and nag me to pieces if I didn't take care of myself.

But what about me. I have done all the right things. I have told myself (and everyone else) that everything is under control, that I have accepted my condition, that I am not really worried.

Sometimes I even believe it myself.

It is hard to be optimistic this Pesach.

It seems strange to be at the same time thinking about universal problems of the Jewish people and my personal difficulty.

But isn't this joining of the national and the individual the essence of Pesach?

The Haggadah tells the story of the freeing of the Jewish people from slavery in Egypt. Yet, we are each enjoined to feel as if each of us, individually, were freed as well.

The entire Jewish nation left Egypt, with their children, possesions, and flocks, but so did mothers and fathers and babies and old people who could no longer walk and toddlers who had not yet learned to walk. A mixture of the grand and the ordinary.

Pesach at its best is a time of good things — the coming of spring, family, the security of tradition, the recognition that just as G-d took us out of slavery so too He will take each of us out of the dark times times into the light.

Let us all take hope from the promise of Pesach, from the fact that time and again we have been redeemed. And from our faith in the intrinsic goodness of a loving G-d.

Chag kasher v'sameach, a happy Pesach to all of you.

Romania, Bulgaria remain worlds apart

By DEBORAH KAZIS
Special to The CJN

Crossing the border into Romania from Bulgaria on an overnight train, there's a loud knock on my door in the middle of the night.

A uniformed border guard loudly demands $100 for a stamp. His English is good enough to threaten to throw me and my bags off the train, but $20 later, all is forgiven. The 200-mile train ride takes 13 hours, but I make it to Bucharest, Romania's capital, just in time for Shabbat.

Bulgaria and Romania are neighbors, but they are worlds apart. The temperature plummets and the snow begins to fall as we cross the border. Bulgaria has a warm, Mediterranean feel but Romania is bitter cold, and the military seems to be everywhere. People are bundled Russian-like in fur hats and coats.

This Friday night almost 100 people come to Bucharest's magnificent Choral Synagogue which dates to 1866. As soon as I enter the wife of the shochet (who ensures that there is kosher meat in Romania) is at my side.

"Where are you from? What are you doing here? Do you have kids? Why not, how old are you?" she throws out. As I start to mutter something about my career she interjets with a broad, knowing smile. "Don't worry you will!" I feel like I'm back in New York.

I sit next to Rosa Epstein, an elderly heavy-set woman with a friendly pink face. She's dressed in many layers of thin clothing and thick green rubber boots. She keeps talking to me in Yiddish, so delighted to have an audience that I don't have the heart to tell her my Yiddish is limited to five words.

She tells me how proud she is of the beautiful synagogue and hushes me when Rabbi Rosen enters wearing his deep purple yarmulke, sash and large Star of David.

It is warm and glowing inside as Romania's chief rabbi leads a traditional service. Music from the choir three balconies up fills the enormous sanctuary.

The schochet's wife reappears and steers me to a seat in the front of the section reserved for the rabbi's wife. I try to resist but quickly realize it's pointless. Formality is not to be taken lightly in Romania, that plus it is impossible to fade into the beautiful woodwork.

True community

As the rebbetzin enters, an attendant puts a large cushion on her chair before she sits. She greets me and inquires whether I'd prefer to speak in Hebrew, English or French.

Before World War II almost a million Jews lived in Romania. Only half survived the Holocaust, and most of the survivors went to Israel. Although only a shadow of what they once were, the 18,000 Jews in Romania today are a true community.

Throughout Eastern Europe, Jewish life was almost completely decimated, first by Hitler and then by communist policies of forced assimilation and complete isolation from the outside Jewish world.

Not in Romania. Through his sheer determination and strength of personality, Rabbi Rosen has been able to help his community survive, and survive as Jews.

Communism in Romania was brutal but the Jews were allowed, for a price, to emigrate to Israel and to live as Jews. They could study Hebrew and run Jewish schools and welfare programs, and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee was allowed to provide support. Romania's Jews were never completely cut off from their Jewishness.

Today the community is anxious for visitors, for connections with Jews from other countries. "They don't come to visit anymore," the community's protocol director says. "American Jews came when there was Ceausescu to see a Jewish community living under communism. But now that the communism is gone, they don't come anymore."

I am invited to Friday night dinner in the synagogue library, an exquisite wood-panelled room where ancient leather copies of the Talmud line the walls. Throughout dinner the Jewish student choir performs for the rabbi and his wife, who sit formally in throne-like chairs. Special songs and a speech on the centrality of women in Judaism are offered in honor of the rebbetzin's 88th birthday.

Fewer people brave the cold

On Saturday morning, fewer people brave the cold to come to services. Only five women occupy the balcony which could seat hundreds. Inside it is warm and it is Shabbat. Outside is Bucharest — cold, dark and depressing.

Anti-Semitism is frequently voiced in the media and press. Under communist rule this was illegal, but now all views can be expressed. Many fear a rise in anti-Semitism should the economic situation continue to worsen or the political situation destabilize.

"Since the end of Communism, the economic situation has deteriorated, and it is much better now for the elderly," says Zvi Feine, the Joint's director for Romania. "But there is also less fear, and more Jews are willing to identify with the community."

The average age of Romania's Jews is 65. For them the community — with support from the Joint — provides desperately needed goods and services: food — including kosher meat, doctors, medicines, warm clothing and firewood.

Chicken soup, delicious egg and onion salad, and hearty meat and noodles are served for lunch in the community's kosher restaurant at Popa Soare Street. The restaurant serves 350 kosher meals a day and the community delivers many hundreds more to elderly Jews who can't leave home. The food is hot and plentiful — quite a rarity in Romania.

"What is the future for Romania's Jews?" I ask everyone I meet. I hear over and over with a shrug of shoulders, "I don't know." Then with broad smiles they add, "the young people will go to Israel!"

The old will remain and fill the four old age homes , and the young will continue to increase Israel's Romanian population.

Rabbi Rosen has set for himself an impossible task. He has dedicated his life to keeping his community alive and thriving — to keeping the Hebrew schools and choirs filled with young people exploring their history and culture and learning Hebrew and Yiddish — while at the same time encouraging the youth to seek a better life in Israel.

Saturday night almost a hundred Jewish youth give a spectacular concert. The rabbi and his wife sit front-row centre and clap and sing along in Yiddish and Hebrew. Children from tiny tots to university students sing traditional Jewish and Israeli songs like Hava Naglia, Hevenu Shalom Aleichem, and Bei Mir Bist Du Shein on a stage decorated in the blue and white of an Israeli flag. I don't know who is singing louder — the choir on the stage or the little ones sitting behind me. "They will all go to Israel," says Rabbi Rosen proudly.

After a short reception with soda and cake, everyone piles into their coats and boots. We leave the warmth of the concert hall, and it is once again cold, dark and cheerless. Three soldiers stand in the falling snow, silently guarding the Jewish Center against possible attacks. Shabbat is over, and I'm back in Romania.

Re'ut means friendship for newcomers

By EDGAR ASHER
Special to The CJN

There is an air of expectency in Sheset Hayamim Street in Ra'anana.

Already half a dozen or so cars have pulled up outside the house of Bila Gordon. The drivers, sometimes accompanied by a passenger, mill around on the sidewalk exchanging greetings. Even while they converse, most have their eyes turned in the same direction, awaiting the arrival of the special bus from Jerusalem.

One excited woman cries out, "Here it comes." The bus screeches to a halt behind the last of the parked cars and a group of chattering school children bustle out of the bus. They wait for a moment by the outside luggage compartment until the driver comes around and opens and secures the big compartment door, so that the children can claim their bags.

As soon as the children take their bags, each quickly identifies a familiar face and within minutes, the cars speed off with their recently arrived guests.

The boys and girls who came from Jerusalem are all from the war-torn former Yugoslavia. They were in Israel from June to October 1992, and this particular group has been coming to Ra'anana once a fortnight to spend Shabbat and most holidays with a host family under the program of the Israel Forum.

Ra'anana, with its proven commitment to involvement with every aspect of aliyah, found no difficulty finding volunteers for its contribution to the Israel Forum.

The seed was sown for the establishment of the Israel Forum in 1983, at the First International Moriah Assembly, when delegates from the Young Leadership of the UJA and a group of Israelis were looking for innovative ways to improve the personal connection between the Diaspora and Israel. At the Second International Moriah Assembly in 1985 the Israel Forum was founded. Although the Forum started as an American-Israeli dialogue, it was not long before it became a truly international organization with active chapters being established in nine European countries.

The Israel Forum has several projects that operate under its aegis. Among them is Re'ut.

Re'ut (Friendship) has as its objective the social absorption of new immigrants. Its main role is the concept of having veteran Israeli families 'adopt' olim on a one-to-one, long-term basis. Re'ut has almost 40 teams of volunteers all over Israel of which Ra'anana is an outstanding example.

"In October last year the first six children from Yugoslavia spent their first weekend with a family in Ra'anana," explains Bila Gordon who is Re'ut's co-ordinator in Ra'anana. "Now, only eight months later we have 70 children to our town once every two weeks. The children who come here are some of the 150 Yugoslav children who were brought to Israel by the Jewish Agency and settled in three schools around the country."

Some of the children have already decided to settle in Israel and some have not made up their minds. Those children who come from parts of the former Yugoslavia like Serbia will probably go home for the summer and return to Israel later on. For many children who lived in Bosnia, there is little or no option to return home; many have not heard from their families since their parents sent them to Israel to spare them the rigors of the Balkan War.

"At first when the children came to Ra'anana they were very withdrawn and blamed Israel for taking them from their parents," explains Bila Gordon. "But slowly the children showed a sure positive and pragmatic approach to their predicament and became responsive and eager to learn Hebrew and mix with their Israeli counterparts.

"The Re'ut hand has become a vital part of their establishment in Israel. Their adoptive families have become an important stabilizing factor — someone to turn to or even just to talk to. There is no question that most of the children miss their parents desperately, particularly those who cannot talk to them by telephone.

Bogan, 14, is from Belgrade and he arrived with his 17-year-old brother Andrei 10 months ago. "At first I didn't like Israel too much, but now I am much happier," says Bogan. "I am able to speak with my parents fairly regularly on the telephone and they tell me that being in Israel is for my own good, even though they miss me very much. Israel is much more modern than I thought and I do like coming to stay with Nir." Nir is Bila Gordon's son and the family have got to know Bogan very well over the past months.

This particular Friday afternoon there are still a few children remaining at Gordon's house waiting to be collected by their host families. One of the boys is Srdan Simon Jaksic from Belgrade. Srdan is a tall 17½-year-old with close cropped hair, who wears a small kippah on the back of his head. He is very agitated because he has not been able to get through to his parents for several weeks. Bila Gordon tells him to try once again to reach them on the phone. He tries again. His mother answers and Srdan talks to her on a cordless phone while pacing up and down between the rooms. After the call, there is obvious relief on his face as the all-important contact, denied to many of his compatriots, has been established.

"I am very uncertain about my future," says Srdan, one of very few children from the former Yugoslavia who has decided to become religious. Before the Yugoslav children came to Israel, they knew little or nothing of their Jewish heritage, apart from the fact of knowing that they were Jewish.

"I want to go back to Belgrade in the summer to see my parents, then I will come back to Israel and go to Yamin Orde school to complete my religious and secular education."

Srdan has also formed firm views about Israel, saying that he does not think that religion and state should mix, but he feels that it is a country that offers a place to everybody and he is not sorry that his parents persuaded him to come.

The personal contacts and commitment of Re'ut members have a vital part to play in immigrant absorption. In Ra'anana, Re'ut enjoys the unqualified support of the municipality, and there is no shortage of Israeli families committed to aliyah, who come forward to offer their homes and their time.

Doll house built by Dr. Fred Stulberg for his wife, Lillian.

Former dentist uses powertools for fun

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

Not many children have a zayde who can build a turreted, gabled wooden dollhouse from scratch and fill it with handcrafted miniature furniture. Retired dentist Dr. Fred Stulberg has made dollhouses for several of his seven grandchildren and also fashioned a swinging crib ornamented with carved hearts for one lucky baby.

A fully equipped basement workshop is the centre for his labors of love.

It isn't only youngsters who are enchanted by Stulberg's fairy tale homes. When he gave away the last one, he had to promise his wife Lillian, that he would make another just for her. It took 120 hours to create the gingerbread trimmed beauty with wraparound veranda and shingled roof on display in the dining room. "I spent more time roofing this doll house than the addition to our own home," Stulberg insists.

Their house and grounds, from the rustic sign out front through the expertly renovated kitchen and professionally constructed rear addition, to the poured concrete patio blocks and natural wood fence at the back, parade the scope of his capabilities. An eager gardener, he did the landscaping as well.

How did a Jewish boy from Malvern Collegiate in Toronto's east end, pointed toward dentistry, learn to use a handsaw and power tools? When other kids were drawn to the firehall or smithy, he was hanging out at Moore Bros., a neighborhood lumber mill and shop specializing in custom church furnishings and windows. Fetching pieces of lumber, helping here and there, he began to learn the art of fine woodwork. "I'm one of only a handful who can still construct a wooden church window if they were made today, but they aren't," he observes.

Stulberg entered the University of Toronto's faculty of dentistry and at 21 was the youngest person to earn his degree to that date. He married his high school sweetheart, Lillian Rosen, and went off to war, serving with the Canadian army dental corps. On his return, he opened a family practice on Kingston Road, in the area where he had grown up. All of the Moores became his patients.

Though the dental practice absorbed the majority of his time, he continued to build things from miniatures to entire rooms, "out of poverty at first; I never paid for anything I could do myself," he says. But the innate need to construct, to design, persisted and he restricted the practice to a 4½-day week.

His interests expanded. He became a knowledgeable stamp collector and Canadian postal historian. He was the first Jewish president of the Royal Philatelic Society of Canada. He eventually disposed of his collection and some of it subsequently went to the National Postal Museum.

Attuned to classical jazz, he was the consultant for a CKCL Radio jazz program during high school years and still has a significant record collection. Louie Armstrong is his favorite.

Stulberg retired from his dental practice in 1989 after 46 years on Kingston Road, and was honored at a reception attended by 300 patients, who presented him with a water color painting of the Balmy Beach life saving station.

A member of Adath Israel Congregation since settling in North York, he has used his talents to fabricate a beautifully proportioned oak Aron Kodesh for the shul and is responsible too, for landscaping the grounds.

At 70, Stulberg continues to widen his experience. Since his retirement, he has collected over 400 joke books, including a copy of Joe Miller's Jests, published in 1739 and is currently enjoying the local seniors and service organizations speaking circuit.

Farm life leaves lasting impact on Jewish family

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

After almost 40 years as an academic and farmer, Frank Tennenhouse has retired, spending six months a year in Victoria and the other six in Winnipeg.

How does it feel to end a hectic routine? Tennenhouse, the youngest of the 12 children (11 boys and 1 girl) born to the late Morris and Annie Tennenhouse, pioneer settlers of a Jewish farm colony near Winnipeg, says he enjoyed his work as an associate professor of agriculture at the University of Manitoba and "never even had a twinge of regret on leaving, but my feelings with the ending of the farm connection are much more complex."

To Tennenhouse, giving up farming has resulted in "a sense of loss . . . of something missing." Despite the hard work and uncertainties of farm life, in which he was involved from early childhood, part of that loss is "standing in the midst of a good ripening crop on a late summer evening with the setting sun reflecting on the heads of grain, creating a glorious flood of color.

"The effect is not so much that of looking at a beautiful landscape as of being in and part of the scene. I think it is the equal of the grandest spectacle that the mountains or sea can offer."

Tennenhouse drifted into academe by accident. After serving in the RCAF he decided to use his war service credits to go to university. His brothers used their credits to buy more farm land. Tennenhouse got his B.Sc. from the University of Manitoba but by then the farm was devoted to grain, which meant no work in the winter.

One of his professors told him: "You're just the kind of guy we need. We have young men here out of the services who want to learn about farming and with your long experience, you can be the perfect teacher."

So without the benefit of further degrees, Tennenhouse became first a lecturer and then moved up to associate professor in agriculture — a position he held for 33 years.

Meanwhile, he and a couple of his brothers formed a partnership to keep the farm going. Tennenhouse farmed all summer and taught in the fall and winter.

It was tough when the harvest would overlap with the beginning of classes. Tennenhouse commuted 30 miles from Winnipeg to the farm near Stony Mountain. He would work on the farm until late at night, rush back to Winnipeg and prepare his lecture for the next day.

By then he had married Ethel Singer, who grew up in the Sonnenfeld Jewish farm colony near Hoffer, Sask., and shared her husband's enthusiasm for farming.

The Tennenhouse zeal for farming originated with the Romanian-born patriarch Morris. He dreamed of owning his own land in a free country, but first moved to England where he became a cabinetmaker and carpenter. He married Anna Stein, whose family came from Austria. The farm dream lingered on.

Eventually the family sailed for Canada, winding up in Winnipeg in 1904.

Morris made a meagre living, building small, cheap houses in the North End, where most Jews lived. He then joined the Jewish Colonization Association movement and settled in the New Hirsch colony, 100 miles northwest of Winnipeg. It wasn't a kibbutz-type settlement. Rather, each settler got a piece of land under the government homestead plan.

Frank, citing stories from his parents and brothers, said the colony was mainly undeveloped bush. Morris, with his building skills and a few others who had livestock experience, fared not too badly. But the others, who were mainly idealists, had a rough time.

Ethel and Frank Tennenhouse at their farm home near Winnipeg during harvest time.

Nevertheless, the colony struggled on. A school was built which was used also as a cheder and synagogue. A healthy Jewish community life existed, said Frank, and one of his brothers served for many years as ritual chair of Rosh Pina synagogue in Winnipeg.

The remarkable thing about colony life, said Frank, was that despite the trials and tribulations "farm life had a lasting effect on the family. [Growing upon the farm] helped us develop the characteristics of tough self-reliance and innovation." After 10 years the colony folded and the Tennenhouse family moved to Stony Mountain.

Stony Mountain was isolated. The family's Jewish life revolved around traditional Friday nights, with the Sabbath candles "shining brightly into the darkness of the prairie nights." The High Holidays were spent in Winnipeg. Tennenhouse recalls his special job was to bring the Passover dishes from the loft.

Their main source of income was selling milk to the city dairies. Frank and his siblings milked the cows twice a day, and in the winter the boys hauled the milk cans several miles through the snow to the nearest highway for the truck pickup.

Another of Frank's jobs was mucking the barn and pumping water for the cows.

Recalling George Washington at Pesach

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

The centennial of the inauguration of George Washington, the first president of the United States, was marked in April 1889 with great pageantry and grand celebrations. As the anniversary of the inauguration fell during Passover that year, American Jews chose to use their homes in general and the seder in particular to celebrate this event.

They created what is now known as the "George Washington Seder." In New York, it was announced that a free picture of George Washington would be given with every purchase of 10 pounds of matzah. Rabbi Jacob Joseph, the chief rabbi of New York, composed a prayer for the occasion that was to be read in all synagogues during Passover.

Across the United States, synagogues were decorated with red, white and blue bunting to capture the centennial spirit.

An illustration by Arthur Meyer from the American Hebrew newspaper on April 19, 1889, portrayed what many Jewish homes looked like for that year's seder. Prominently displayed near the front door was the picture of George Washington, so that Elijah the Prophet could be welcomed by America's first president.

The champion of American independence and the first president to have contact with the Jews in the United States, Washington was naturally woven into the story of the Jewish celebration of freedom.

Washington was the first major American leader to emphasize the importance of religious freedom for Jews. His assertion of full citizenship for American Jews was unparalleled by any other world leader.

Benjamin Franklin used biblical symbols to describe the first president: "Here's to George Washington, the Joshua who commanded the sun and the moon to stand still, and they obeyed him."

He quoted the president's words of August 1790 to the "Israelites" of Newport, R.I.: "May the stock of Abraham, who dwell in this land, continue to merit and enjoy the good will of the other inhabitants while everyone shall sit in safety under his own vine and fig tree, and there shall be none to make him afraid."

Preparation in high gear

With preparations for the centennial in high gear, a major effort was made to ensure that every Jewish home had a picture of Washington. Whether every Jewish home then had a mezuzah might be questionable, but as many as 90 per cent of the households of that era, had Washington's picture proudly displayed, according to one report.

In describing the Passover illustration by Meyer, the American Hebrew newspaper noted that the master of the house wears his "shroud, which most pious Jews wear also on the Day of Atonement." The other male guests all wore high hats and formal dress. The women had on their finest dresses. A child skilfully steals the afikoman.

In his introduction to the American Heritage Haggadah in 1992, the first work in this century to reproduce the 19th century illustration by Meyer, Stuart Eizenstat emphasized that in the depiction of the "George Washington Seder in 1889, our first president is shown near the door awaiting Elijah's arrival. What a wonderful integration of Americana with Judaica!"

As far away as Jerusalem, Eliezer Ben-Yehuda, the pioneer of the modern revival of the Hebrew language, reported on the Washington centennial celebration for his newspaper HaZevi.

Ben-Yehuda wrote that the "abounding joy and happiness of the event was shared by Democrats and Republicans alike."

The streets of New York 100 years ago resounded on Passover night not just with the traditional seder melodies but with the Star-Spangled Banner and America, My Country 'Tis of Thee.

The celebration itself in New York on April 30, 1889, was quite a sight. The public festivities included a march by 200 Jewish boys, led by the fife and drum corps of the Hebrew Sheltering Guardian Society Asylum.

Giving the Jews of the United States an even greater sense of belonging to the American nation was the young woman selected to address President Benjamin Harrison at New York's City Hall.

She was Annie Alida Abrams, a Jewish senior at the city's Normal College, a teaching institution, and a Sunday-school teacher at the Shaarey Tefilah synagogue.

Professional Circle — the Sky Club is home to the national Israeli skydiving team.

Skydiving proves popular in Israel

Jerusalem Dateline

Sky Club, the Israeli skydiving centre and school, is located on Habonim Beach just south of Haifa. It was started by businessman Ami Pili in January 1993.

"People from age 16 to 60 come here to learn to skydive," says instructor Mordi Elmaliach. Elmaliach learned to skydive in the Israeli army, as did all the instructors. Sky Club has over 160 regular members and is affiliated with the Federation of Aeronautics International (FAI).

Sky Club offers enthusiasts three ways to take their first jump (after having had a check-up by a doctor):

The Tandem Jump: After 30 minutes of instruction, the jumper is strapped to an instructor and falls from a height of 11,000 feet. A 50-second free fall is followed by a 10-minute parachute drop.

The Static Line Course: A three-day course during which participants make three jumps from 3,500 feet. After 30 jumps, graduates can apply for Class A certification.

The Accelerated Freefall Course: Six sessions include six jumps from 10,500 feet. Two instructors accompany the skydiver for support and instruction in proper body positioning. At course end, the diver receives Class A certification.

The Sky Club is home to the national Israeli skydiving team. European teams practice in Israel's temperate winter climate.

With cleaning done there's time to pick up a book

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

You may think that around Pesach there is simply no time to read. That may even be true. Just remember — the kitchen will be cleaned, the chicken will get cooked, and you will have a few hours to relax once the holiday is here. So, you have our permission to collapse onto an easy chair, get a cup of tea and a macaroon, and dig in.

Jewish tradition calls loshon hora (gossip) one of the worst sins, one with untold ramifications for the gossiper, the listener, the victim and the Jewish people as a whole.

Be sure and read Stephen Wylen's Gossip; the power of the word (Ktav, 1994). This is an excellent discussion of what constitutes loshon hora, and how to deal with it. Examples are down-to-earth and drawn from everyday life. The book will certainly be profound food for thought, especially for those who consider a friendly telephone gab-fest (about someone else) always harmless fun.

Judaism makes no bones about the power of language. Lawrence Kushner has written a fascinating new book, The Book of Words (Jewish Lights, 1993), dealing with commonly used — and commonly misused — words.

Freedom, love, money, faith, laughter, repentence are just a few of the terms Kushner discusses, analyses, gives different interpretations for. He cites midrash, biblical and rabbinic texts, theologians, rabbis and great thinkers. A fascinating book.

A delightful new book is Morris Margolies' A Gathering of Angels; angels in Jewish life and literature (Ballantine Books, 1994). Margolies discusses the background, purpose and deeper meaning of angels in Jewish traditional literature. Illustrations are of old depictions of angels, and add interest as well as showing the differing attributes.

This is by no means a definitive book, and it is disheartening to find a major error early in the book (The second time Ishmael and Hagar were exiled was well after Isaac's birth, and the author surely knows that). Nevertheless, the book is fun to read.

****

The Litman Library of Jewish Civilization has recently published two fascinating, albeit totally unrelated books.

One People? Tradition, modernity, and Jewish unity is a scholarly yet readable discussion of the relationship between Orthodox and non-Orthodox streams of Judaism by Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, Chief Rabbi of the British Commonwealth.

Rabbi Sacks discusses differing attitudes and ways of dealing with such major issues as the Holocaust, changing approaches to the notion of covenant and the role of Halachah.

Realism, Caricature and Bias; the fiction of Mendele Mocher Sefarim by David Aberbach is a serious analysis of the works of a great Yiddish and Hebrew novelist in turn of the century Russia.

Sefarim is seen as a well-loved yet ascerbic critic of the Jewish world of the late 1800s and early 1900s, with its sorrows, philosophical debates and personalities.

****

An incredibly effective Holocaust book that recently arrived at my desk is Holocaust Remembrance; the shapes of memory, edited by Geoffrey Hartman (Blackwell, 1994).

This is one of the best selections of short Holocaust reminiscences I have seen. They are well-written, and their concise, sharp style makes the horrifying content even more nightmarish.

Fanya Gottesfeld Heller was a teenager when she was forced to hide from the Nazis in the Ukraine. Strange and unexpected love; a teenage girl's holocaust memoirs (Ktav, 1993) is the painfully moving story of her increasingly warm relationship with the kind-hearted Christian man who saved her. The book also deals with the awful dilemma that some Jews had to face; to stay with the non-Jew they had grown to care for or to return to their own people.

****

Finding healthy, tasty and easy to make recipes can be difficult. Well, it's easy to fulfil one of those criteria, but more?

A very successful attempt at such a cookbook is Microwave to Your Heart's Content; a heart-healthy cookbook by Norma Schonwetter (available from the author, 23600 Cloverlawn, Oak Park, Michigar 48237, 1993.)

While all the recipes are not kosher, there are plenty that are. Her fish dishes are great, as are her pasta, all are loaded with appealing spices, tasty vegetables and a reliance on non-processed ingredients. Her soups are great too.

A nutritional analysis is provided for each entry.

Choosing a name for your baby can be a traumatic experience. You want your child to have a name that he likes, that you like, that the grandparents like, that won't be too dated in 10 years.

For Ashkenazi Jews, we often name our children after a departed relative — but what do we call little Yankel or Gitty in English?

Linda Rosenkrantz and Pamela Redmond Satran have produced a delightful book, Beyond Sarah & Sam; an enlightened guide to Jewish baby naming (St. Martin's Press, 1992) that somehow I have just had delivered to me.

Their discussions of what constitutes "Fashionable classics" or "Movie Mogul Names" are hilarious — not that I would personally name my son Adolph after Adolph Zukor.

Humor aside, it is a good basis for deciding on a name, with lots of examples, comparisons and translations.

The New Jewish Baby Book; names, ceremonies & customs; a guide for today's families by Anita Diamant (Jewish Lights, 1993) goes beyond choosing a name (although there are lots to choose from — in fact, the selection of Hebrew and Yiddish names is excellent).

But Diamant also offers ceremonies and prayers for different parts of the birth cycle, from pregnancy to brit millah to suggestions for announcments. An interesting chapter suggests ceremonies to welcome a daughter, a welcome addition to the Jewish life cycle repertoire.

While the strictly Orthodox might jibe at some of the "politically correct" suggestions (come to think of it, "Welcome Woman-Child/Newborn guardian/of the sacred gift/of cycles and seasons" is a bit much) there is much that is absorbing, interesting and helpful.

Diamant's attempts to find a place in Jewish ritual for the non-Jewish relatives is especially valuable.

****

Scholastic Press is a wonderful publisher who puts out excellent children's books, well illustrated, carefully bound, and usually of real interest to young readers.

A big box of their recent output yielded several of particualarly Jewish interest.

The untiring Gordon Korman has another book, for once not including the boys of Macdonald Hall.

The Twinkie Squad (1992) is a story to cheer about, with the despised Twinkie Squad (originally a discussion group) winding up as the envy of the school. The ultimate triumph of good over evil — er — nerd over cool.

That superb Canadian teenagers' author Carol Matas has begun her promised series of books for younger children. In The Lost Locket (1994), 8-year-old Roz is given a locket that belonged to her great-grandmother. When she foolishly takes it to school, the class bully steals it.

Her desperate attempts to recover it before her parents find out, as well as how she deals with the bully, make entertaining reading for the 7- to 9-year-old reader.

Noah's Ark is a perpetually popular topic for children's books, and Two by Two by Barbara Reid (1992) is no exception.

Designed for the young child, the illustrations are colorful and fun. The story is told in humorous verse. (I liked "And in came the animals three by three,/the fleas rode in on a chimpanzee." — accompanied by a picture of two chimps energetically scratching themselves.).

Not specifically Jewish, but a great book to get, is Places to Go, People to See, Things to Do All Across Canada, by E. Joan Abeles (1994).

The book is divided by province, and includes maps, photos and sketches. Suggestions include sports sites, historic places, theatres and museums — just about anything you would want to do with your child.

It is written with an unabashed love of Canada that is refreshing in this ever-so-correct age.

Road to Mideast peace has often been bumpy

Is the celebrated handshake between Yitzhak Rabin and Yasser Arafat on the White House lawn on September 13, 1993, a true watershed in the difficult road to peace? Only time will tell. To help put recent events in perspective, here is a short review of some landmarks in the troubled history of the Middle East.

From 1516 to 1917, Palestine, the Holy Land, was part of the Ottoman Empire, but never as a single administrative unit. Though districts' boundaries fluctuated, there were always three main regions: the northern district, ruled from Beirut in Lebanon; the southern district, which included Jerusalem; and Transjordan, ruled from Damascus.

During the second part of the nineteenth century, a steady flow of Jewish emigrants from Eastern Europe came to strengthen the Jewish communities who had steadfastly remained in the Holy Land through all the centuries of oppression. By the beginning of the twentieth century, the first kibbutzim were taking root, the new city of Tel Aviv and new Jewish towns in the Galilee were developing, and Jews were well on the way to becoming a majority in Jerusalem.

At the same time, an Arab nationalist movement under Turkish rule was taking shape in the Middle East. Europe was moving towards the First World War, and the Turks decided to throw in their lot with Germany. The Middle East became a pawn in the game. British agents worked hard to promote the Great Arab Revolt of 1916 against the Turks, which greatly helped the Allies. Promises were made to the ruler of Mecca, Sherif Hussein, and a tentative carving-up of the Turkish empire was decided upon between France and Great Britain. These and other agreements were embodied in a series of documents kept secret at the time. The situation for Jews in Eastern Europe was getting steadily worse, with a succession of horrendous pogroms such as that of Kishinev in 1905.

The Zionist movement met with a measure of sympathy, which led to the Balfour declaration of Nov. 2, 1917: His Majesty's government, it said, would view with favor the establishment of a Jewish national home in Palestine. A month later, Jerusalem fell to the British troops of General Allenby.

With the defeat of Germany and Turkey, the League of Nations then formally conferred a mandate on Palestine to Great Britain, while reiterating "the historical connection of the Jewish people with Palestine." That provision, however, did not apply to Transjordan, which had been given away by England to Emir Abdullah, son of Hussein. Feisal, another son, was made king of Iraq, and France received a similar mandate on Syria and Lebanon.

Soon there was an open confrontation between Zionism and Arab nationalism. While moderate Arab leaders were disposed to accept the new partition of the country into two states (apart from Transjordan), radical Arabs opposed it. The Holy Land was torn by strife. In an effort to maintain peace, British authorities imposed strict restrictions upon Jewish immigration; these restrictions were not lifted during World War II, nor after, when the extent of the Holocaust was revealed to the world.

In 1947, Great Britain, feeling that it could no longer cope with the conflict between the local Jews and Arabs, decided to hand the problem over to the United Nations. On Nov. 29, 1947 the United Nations voted in favor of the partition of Palestine into two states, one Jewish and one Arab, with Jerusalem as an international enclave. The Arabs rejected that decision.

The State of Israel was born on May 15, 1948, and was immediately attacked by the armies of all neighboring Arab states. Some 700,000 Arab civilians left their homes in Israel to take shelter in makeshift camps across the borders. Israel successfully withstood the combined Arab attack. However, at the war's end, Egypt had taken the Gaza strip, Transjordan had occupied the West Bank of the Jordan river, and Jerusalem was divided. The refugees could no longer return.

In 1958, Yasser Arafat created the Palestine Liberation Movement. In 1964, the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) was set up in Egypt under the auspices of the Arab League. At that time Judea, Samaria and Gaza were under Arab rule.

In 1967, following the Egyptian blockade of the Gulf of Aqaba in the Red Sea, the Six-Day War broke out. Israel took over Judea, Samaria and the Gaza Strip, as well as the Sinai Desert and the Golan Heights. Its offers of peace and withdrawal from occupied territories were rejected at Khartoum in July 1967: no to negotiations, no to recognition of Israel, no to peace, was the Arab answer.

In 1973, the Egyptian army crossed the Suez Canal and the Syrians launched an attack on the Golan. Both were pushed back. UN resolutions 242 and 338 were passed to provide the basis of a just and lasting peace.

In November 1977, Anwar al-Sadat made a historic visit to Jerusalem. Peace between Israel and Egypt was negotiated at Camp David in 1978 and signed in March 1979. Israel withdrew from the Sinai and both countries set up embassies in 1980.

The road to peace was still arduous: Sadat was assassinated by Arab radicals, increased terrorist activities from Lebanon led to yet another bloody war in 1982, and opposition to Israel's continued presence in Judea, Samaria and Gaza led to the intifada in December 1987.

Under the joint patronage of the United States and the Soviet Union, a peace conference convened in Madrid in September 1991. Israel, Syria, Lebanon and a joint Jordan-Palestine delegation sat at the same table.

Two years later, in September 1993, the first declaration of intent was signed by Israeli and Palestinian representatives; the following day Israelis and Jordanians signed an agreed agenda for peace negotiations between the two countries.

Talpiot welcomes new refugees

UJA Press Service

In the 1950s, Jerusalem's Talpiot neighborhood was a tent settlement for Jewish refugees. The majority of its residents were from Iraq, Iran, Morocco and other parts of North Africa.

Today, the neighborhood is again receiving new immigrants, this time from the former Soviet Union and Ethiopia. They are part of a wave of aliyah made possible by the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), a major recipient of American Jewry's contributions to the UJA/Federation Annual and Operation Exodus campaigns.

The neighborhood, which has expanded considerably since 1967, contains many schools and an impressive community centre, as well as a population eager to take part in the available educational and social programs.

A popular summer festival is organized by community volunteers each year at the community centre. Russian, Ethiopian and native-born Israeli children dance to popular Israeli music, while games and clowns, flowers and balloons, mimes and storytellers add to the festive atmosphere.

One community worker says of the annual event, "We are trying to bring the new immigrants into contact with Israelis who have much in common with them.

"The festival provides an excellent opportunity for the newcomers to emerge from their caravans and hotels and mingle with other Israelis. More often than not, these chance meetings have developed into rewarding friendships."

Sara Abergel, who arrived in 1949 from Alexandria, Egypt, remembers Talpiot in the early years. "It was shocking. There were tents and cabins — no buildings," she says.

Now she sees changes taking place as a result of the influx of new immigrants and hopes for even more community progrzms for the children. "When kids are busy enough, they always stay out of trouble."

Benny Vachnoun, who made aliyah from Morocco in 1964, chairs the Talpiot residents' association. "I have a full understanding of the immigrant experience," he says, explaining that emigres who live in a nearby caravan park are as important as newcomers living in the absorpiton centre, temporarily converted from a local hotel.

"We do whatever we can for new immigrants," says Vachnoun, "and we would like to see other communities in Israel do the same."

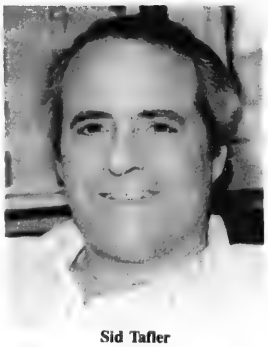
Monday Magazine finds niche in B.C.

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent



Sid Tafler

In a small city such as Victoria, which overflows with publications (a local daily, two Vancouver dailies, an area-wide community weekly and innumerable special interest papers), Monday Magazine is surprisingly well-accepted by the local population, and the advertising keeps pouring in.

Former Montrealer Sid Tafler, the Jewish editor, says the free newsprint weekly can be described as progressive in its views, with a rather irreverent and untraditional approach to the news.

Monday is a member of the United States-based Association of Alternative Newsweeklies (AAN). Tafler says AAN members are practising the "new journalism . . . they're a particular breed who aren't necessarily objective in their coverage." Toronto's Now Magazine fits into the category, he says, although that paper focuses more on entertainment than does Monday.

Monday, with the slogan "No week is complete without Monday," is distributed on Thursday. When the paper started about 19 years ago, it was slated for Mondays because that was the day the two local dailies didn't publish. However, the dailies merged and began publishing seven days a week. Monday's readership took a beating. So distribution in high-traffic areas throughout the city of Victoria was shifted to later in the week and readership zoomed.

Monday distributes 41,000 copies weekly, most of which are quickly snapped up.

Tafler says that Monday covers the political scene; however, "we have no political philosophy. We don't take sides. But we do comment. We don't give anybody a hard time — mainly we're looking for good government."

The paper does, however, endorse a slate of civic candidates, "not on a political basis but on who can do the best job for the city."

As an example, Tafler pointed to his Public Eye column which reported before any other paper that "the thinnest of cracks appeared in Premier Mike Harcourt (NDP) government's concrete foundation. It came in the form of a challenge from a new political figure, newly-elected Councillor Bob Friedland." The column said Friedland, "an NDP activist with some serious reservations about Harcourt's leadership," had called for a phone-in leadership review.

Tafler is mildly critical of Friedland but says in his column "we should give him the benefit of the doubt and acknowledge his right to play politics at the provincial level. . . From here on, we hope he'll expand his political energy on civic matters." Tafler warns though that NDP leaders "may be less forgiving. They have a strong aversion to airing internal disputes in public. Anyone who breaks the unwritten code risks becoming the messenger who gets shot for bringing bad news."

Tafler tackled the issue of the press ban on the Karla Teale murder trial in Ontario, and concluded that "this unusual instance of a press ban suggests that 'fair trial' are just code words for 'let's make sure the bastard doesn't get off on a technicality.' "

Monday made a direct legal appeal to the judge to lift the ban on the grounds that readers in Victoria, 3,000 kilometres away, were not likely to be called as jurors. The judge didn't give a decision.

Going into the federal field, Tafler examined the case of David Anderson, the Victoria MP and cabinet minister who wanted to sue the federal government for a breach of contract during the Mulroney era. He noted that the Vancouver media "have been especially hostile" to Anderson on this matter and, promoting civic pride, said the "undercurrent of this media outrage in the big smog belt on the mainland is that Chretien appointed a minister from Victoria ahead of Vancouver."

Monday has attractive covers featuring large photos with a difference. To promote a story on "The Privileged Poor" Tafler used a glamor girl on the cover wearing couture clothes bought at a second-hand shop.

The article reports on how the many highly-educated people living in Victoria are settling for doing anything because they can't get jobs for which they are trained. One example is an MBA with 10 years of experience in the aerospace industry who counts moose teeth for a living. Hunters have to send to a government agency two lower teeth from each moose they kill so the ministry can keep track of the moose population.

"Victoria," says the article, "is rampant with people who have superior education but who have no jobs." Tafler said Victoria is a tough place to get a good job, as he, himself, discovered when he first came here from Montreal.

Tafler, who is membership chair of Congregation Emanu-El, says he often covers matters of Jewish concerns if they are of interest to the general readership. He says he carried a story written about the late Holocaust survivor Willie Jacobs, who was one of the prime movers in erecting a Holocaust memorial here, and was a frequent speaker in classrooms and at service clubs on the Holocaust.

He covered the Gulf War from the angle of Israel being used as a ploy by Iraq to dominate the Middle East. He has carried features on Israel by Victorians who have been there. His parents live on a kibbutz near Tel Aviv.

The extensive renovation of the synagogue and having the government declare it a heritage building (it's 130 years old) was another major feature.

Tafler believes there is a small hard core of neo-Nazis in Victoria and is trying to pin down the facts. "There are signs of this," he said. "It's no coincidence that when Holocaust denier David Irving came here to speak he got a large turnout." One German woman he interviewed after the meeting (which Tafler attended) commented in Monday: "Never would I have believed there would be a revival of Nazism — especially in Victoria."

Tafler thinks a lot of ex-German troops live here and there's a large German population. But he thinks every city has its share of neo-Nazis.

Minorities come here as well as "social refugees"— people who want to get away from marital and other such problems.

The future of the growing Jewish community looks good, he says, and he doesn't see the neo-Nazis as a major obstacle for increased Jewish population.

Tafler has been in Victoria for about a dozen years. He started out in newspaper work with Canadian Press in Montreal 18 years ago, followed by a stint with the Calgary Herald. When he came to Victoria, he freelanced from the press gallery for several Eastern newspapers as well as for Monday. But it was a tough grind and when he was offered full-time work with Monday, he grabbed it. Ultimately he became editor. He heads up a five-person editorial staff.

Monday Publications Ltd. owns a number of other publications and operates a commercial graphic arts service. Tafler is on the management committee of the company.

He recently won for a second time the Neville Shanks Memorial Award from the B.C. and Yukon Community Newspaper Association.

Tiny Jewish community thrives in Bonaire

By MARC HUBER
Special to The CJN

Although there are only 8 Jews in Bonaire, plans are underway to build a Jewish cemetery.

Morey Ruza contacted the island's government after an elderly Jewish woman living in her retirement condominium wanted to be buried in Bonaire. Despite its small size, the island's government was surprised at the extent of Bonaire's Jewish population and permission has been granted to construct the cemetery in accordance with Jewish law. Unfortunately, the elderly woman making the initial request recently passed away.

Originally from Long Island, 43-year-old Ruza has been living in Bonaire since 1981. The former Solomon Shecter School student used to spend his summer vacations in Ontario at Camp Ramah. Ruza went on three divine holidays in Bonaire before deciding to move.

Ruza used to be one of the owners of Captain Don's Habitat, a resort catering primarily to scuba divers. After selling his interest in the hotel last year, Ruza opened a branch of Dalia, a Dutch Caribbean retailer selling unique fabrics and gifts produced in Indonesia. This step marked a return to the shmata business for Ruza. Before he left Long Island, he worked in his family's fashion accessory manufacturing firm.

Despite turning away from organized religion in his early years, Ruza has become comfortable with his own form of Judaism. "I take pride in tracing my ethnic heritage. And I've become quite interested in a more spiritual path. I've been reading a lot of books about Jewish mysticism and metaphysics." Chassidim from New York City annually visit Bonaire's few Jews to solicit donations, sell books, and encourage men to put on tefillin.

Along with studying the Kaballah, Ruza stays in touch with his Jewish roots by continuing to celebrate Jewish holidays with his spouse (Linda) and two children. "It was important to do something for our kids." Every Passover, Ruza invited Jewish hotel guests to join his family for a Seder.

He was delighted to leave his boutique for a coffee break to discuss Bonaire's Jewish community. Another Jewish merchant owns Lippman's Jewellers and a Jewish family owns the Sand Dollar Hotel. Toronto's John and Sarah Stoneman stayed at Ruza's former hotel while filming three episodes on Bonaire's marine life for their former CTV series.

Ruza has encountered very little anti-Semitism in Bonaire. "People are very tolerant. They don't have any preconceived notions," says Ruza.

His family did experience one disturbing incident at the private school attended by his children. The school was operated by evangelical Christians who told Ruza's children that they were going to "burn" because they were Jews. "But we didn't back away. We confronted the school and they started to tone that stuff down," says Ruza.

Now one of Ruza's daughters is married and his teenage daughter is living with her mother in Miami. Ruza is shortly joining the rest of his family in Miami.

Although he's going to continue operating the store in Bonaire, he is also undertaking a new venture based in Miami. Ruza obtained exclusive rights to distribute a new, energy-saving device throughout the Caribbean.

The plug-in module, being developed by Green Technologies, enables electrical appliances to operate more efficiently by reducing power demands.

Bonaire's first hotel, the Divi Flamingo Beach resort, has an interesting history. During World War II, the hotel's original buildings were used as an internment camp for German nationals living in the Dutch Caribbean. German Jews were separately interned at Plantation Guatemala to protect them from the cruelty of the other German prisoners.

In 1951, a Dutch visitor decided to turn the main internment camp's wooden barracks into a hotel. The hotel still exists but the wooden barracks were replaced over twenty years ago. After the war, Plantation Guatemala was used as a summer camp and a private residence is now on the site.

Alga protects plants from sun

Jerusalem Dateline

Agricultural crops resistant to strong sunlight may one day be cultivated in some of the hottest and most drought-ridden parts of the world, now that Israeli scientists have discovered a way of protecting plants from the sun.

Researchers at the Weizmann Institute of Science studied the sun-protection mechanism in Dunaliella bardawil, a microscopic alga that grows in salty waters. This single-cell organism is famous for thriving in the brackish marshes of the Sinai Desert and the Dead Sea.

The alga fascinates scientists because it is a remarkable survivor and functionally very similar to higher plants, said Prof. Ada Zamir of the Institute's Department of Biochemistry. Her team is studying it as a model for growing useful crops under harsh conditions.

Excessive sunlight causes most plants to produce toxic oxygen molecules that eventually destroy the plant's photosynthetic machinery.

Zamir and her associates have discovered a protein, known as Cbr, that protects this machinery. Cbr has been cloned through genetic engineering.

Cbr produces large quantities of beta-carotene, an orange pigment that serves as the plant's natural sunscreen.

Israeli transplant athletes among tops

Jerusalem Dateline

Moshe Givoni's performance in taking the silver medal in the 100-metre freestyle swimming event was remarkable. The 24-year-old has cystic fibrosis and three years ago underwent a heart and lung transplant.

Israelis won two silver and one bronze medals at the World Transplant Games held in Vancouver last summer. It was the ninth olympiad for transplant athletes, and Israel is one of a handful of nations that have participated since 1978. Over the years Israeli have won three gold, eight silver and two bronze medals.

The most successful Israeli transplant athlete is female cyclist Osnat Glamm, who won silver medals in Singapore and Hungary. But Glamm, who underwent a kidney transplant 10 years ago, dropped out of the Canadian race because of injuries.

Close to 800 athletes from 31 countries competed in the Vancouver games. All have had transplants of major organs or bone marrow at some stage in their lives. The Israeli team was nine people strong.

"The most amazing fact about the opening ceremony [was] that a generation ago all 800 competitors would not have been alive," said Dr. Reuven Pfefferman, Israel's representative on the World Transplant Games Federation Council.

"All the participants share the knowledge that they are lucky to be alive."

Pfefferman, a surgeon specializing in kidney transplants, is currently director of the Surgery Department at Kaplan Hospital in Rehovot.

He said the games help improve participants' self-image and educate the public about transplant patients.

"In the popular mind transplant patients are often seen as disabled or handicapped. Nothing could be further from the truth. Transplant patients are often very young and after surgery can lead fully healthy lives."

Events are categorized by age and not by transplant. Thus Givoni's silver medal for swimming was all the more impressive because he prevailed over competitors with kidney and bone marrow grafts compared to his more complex heart-lung transplant.

Rabbinical Reflections

Pesach

By RABBI AARON LEVINE

Before chanting the Kiddush on the seder nights, many have the custom of reciting or singing the fifteen steps that comprise the seder service.

They are: 1) Kadesh (the kiddush); 2) Urchatz (the first washing of the hands without a brachah in preparation for eating the karpas); 3) Karpas (eating the vegetable dipped in salt water); 4) Yachatz (breaking the middle matzah, the smaller half serving as the bread of poverty over which the Haggadah is recited, the larger half set aside for Afikoman); 5) Maggid (reciting the Haggadah); 6) Rachtzah (washing the hands with a blessing before eating the matzah); 7) Motzee (the first customary blessing over what is usually bread and now is the matzah); 8) Matzah (the specific and special blessing over the matzah); 9) Maror (the blessing and the eating of the bitter herbs dipped into charoses); 10) Korech (the eating of the matzah-maror sandwich); 11) Shulchan Oreich (the festival meal); 12) Tzafun (the eating of the Afikoman); 13) Bareich (the Grace after meals); 14) Hallel (the recitation of the Psalms of praise and declarations of our faith in HaShem); 15) Nirtzah (the concluding prayers that our seder service be accepted by HaShem and the Mashiach comes speedily).

It is also customary for the leader of the service and the participants to announce each step out loud as it is about to be observed. On a simple level, both of the above are to ensure that the proper order and sequence of the seder service steps are followed correctly. The very word "seder" means order, and we want to make sure that we strictly follow the correct order of the seder night.

But as with all other laws and customs of our Torah and tradition, there is a deeper significance alluded to by this practice. What follows is a brief treatment of the lessons within the wording of each step as taught by the Alshech HaKodosh (Rabbi Moses Alshech of Safed, Palestine) who lived in the second half of the 16th century (died 1573).

Kadesh. This word also means that one should sanctify oneself (from the word kodosh), and particularly refers to abstaining from even permissible conduct which, when practised to excess, distances a person from holiness. One has to temper even what is permitted; over-indulgence in anything can detract from the sanctified heights of conduct to which man should aspire.

Urchatz. The word connotes washing and cleansing and alludes to the mandate that one should at all times cleanse one's soul from impurity and avoid conduct that will sully one's divine soul.

Karpas. The Hebrew letters can be arranged to read kaf rash (interchanging the samech with the shin). This alludes to the fact that one should indulge oneself sparingly, but should nevertheless treat the poor with magnanimity, filling their hands with whatever good one can bestow upon them.

Yachatz. This means dividing the matzah, half for oneself; half for Tzafun (the Afikoman), and alludes to the fact that we should divide and share whatever possessions we have with the poor. The merits attained through this act of selflessness will accrue to us (tzafun — be hidden and held for us) in the World to Come.

Maggid-Rachtzah. One should merit being able to tell (teach) others how to report (wash and cleanse themselves). We should be concerned with the spiritual welfare of others and endeavor to influence them to lead a life of Torah and mitzvah observance despite the secular motto of "mind your own business."

Motzee-Matzah. In deeper terms, chametz (leavened bread) signifies the yetzer hora (the evil inclination); matzah — the yetzer hatov (man's good inclination). The word motzee means to bring out or bring forth.

Hence we allude to the task of bringing out (developing and strengthening) our inclination to do good, and suppressing our evil inclination.

Maror. This word means bitter and is another allusion to the evil inclination which at first seems sweet to man but leads to a bitter end. This reminds me of the well-known riddle: What is the difference between a cold mikvah and a sin? By the former we first say "oy" and then "ah;" by the latter — we first say "ah" and then "oy."

Koreich. This word means to combine (actually the matzah and morror). This alludes to the fact that we should combine the yetzer hora and the yetzer hatov — harnessing the advantages of both toward the service of HaShem (as it says: bechol levovchah — bishnei yitzrecha). For example, if a person has an evil inclination to spend money (to be a spendthrift), then he should channel this inclination to the service of HaShem and spend money easily for tzedakah and acts of kindness. If a person has the bad midah (characteristic) of becoming easily angered, he should use this temperament against those who mock and blaspheme the Torah and mitzvot, but should otherwise control his anger.

Shulchan Oreich. These words mean a prepared table, and allude to the fact that one should lead a righteous life in this world so that as his reward, he can prepare his table and be able to eat from the eternal fruits of the World to Come.

Tzafun. The word means hidden or stored up. This again alludes to conducting oneself in a righteous manner so that one's good deeds will be hidden away or stored away in the treasure house of the World to Come. (Ma rav tuvchah asher tzofanta leereiachah — How great is Thy goodness which Thou has stored away for Your righteous ones — Psalms 31:20).

Bareich (Bless), Hallel (Praise), Nirtzah (Acceptable). May we merit to bless HaShem with praises that emanate from the redemption of Gan Eden rather than the praises that one is forced to utter in Gehinnom (the Netherworld) where he must accede that yaffe danta (You judged correctly). For after all is it not the life in Gan Eden that is acceptable to us rather than the other life?

As we go through the steps of the seder let us reflect on their deeper meanings and by so doing merit a share in that great World which is stored up for those who follow and obey the will of the Almighty! Chag Somayach.

Passover in Israel elicits mixed emotions

By MARK CLARFIELD
Special to The CJN

When I still lived in Canada, I always enjoyed Passover more than any other Jewish holiday. Both the universal and particular messages relating to freedom and national liberation spoke to me. The seder with its wine, songs — even the food was great. The company of grandparents, parents, brothers, sisters, cousins and assorted hangers-on has always been much appreciated.

But my wife and I uttered the fateful words "Next year in Jerusalem" so many times, and thought about the possibility so often, that we finally decided to take things to their logical conclusion. Our little nuclear family emigrated to the Holy Land this past summer and this spring we face our first seder in Israel.

It is not only with a touch of excitement, but of wistfulness that we approach the holiday this year. As Jews, we have returned to our homeland to partake in the great national experiment of Zionism. And what better celebration of this act is there than the Passover seder, which commemorates the escape of our ancestors from bondage in Egypt to freedom in the Land of Israel.

But there's also an element of sadness for people like us, as the extended family dimension of the holiday will be conspicuously absent.

My non-Jewish friends in Canada, like homing pigeons, almost always return to their parental abode each Easter, the family element of that holiday in many cases being of far greater importance than the religious. In the case of the Jews, Passover holds an analogous place in our collective hearts. I for one have only missed one family seder in all of my 43 years on this planet. There is a rare Jew who doesn't make it to his parents' (and/or in-laws') table to hunker down, tell jokes and even to pray a bit.

Grandparents and later parents ran the seders, repeatedly calling down to us at the other end of the long table: "Sha, be quiet down there! Who's next? Janice, stop spilling your wine! Geoff sit still!!"

And being Canadians, the exact order of these seders was finely timed. We always managed to take in the last period of the hockey play-offs, somewhere between dinner and the slew of festive songs which ring out the seder.

When I was a youngster growing up in Toronto, we felt there was a permanence about who was going to lead the show. There has always been a Grandpa at the head of the table. Even the passing of this generation, in the end, failed to disturb the process, offering via our parents a natural, satisfying and comforting transition.

But those Jews who move to this country, leaving family behind in Canada, offer up a huge sacrifice, not generally recognized by their fellow Israelis. Their parents may live as far away as a hundred kilometres.

I guess we could consider flying the whole crew back to Toronto for a week. After all, during the Passover break the kids aren't in school for what seems like a dog's age. And from what I've heard, during this season, the work environment suffers too. The three week Passover school holiday, at least on paper, looks to my workaholic mind to be almost as much of a disaster as September. During that month, school is repeatedly interrupted by another load of Jewish holidays which include the New Year and Day of Atonement.

However, even taking into account that there are two seders — at four hours a throw — I compute the minimal cost of transporting our family to such a get-together at nearly $600 an hour. Not something most of us on Israeli nonsalaries could countenance each year.

And it's not just our parents we will miss. What about brothers and sisters? How about all of those cousins with whom I lived summer after summer at the cottage on Lake Simcoe? How am I going to catch up on all the family gossip?

The Four Questions traditionally asked by the youngest child present, will also present a problem. "The kids" (our generation) and my kids (the next generation) always posed these questions to the older generation. My own children have never asked me. They always queried my father. How am I going to feel when my 7 year old turns to me? Am I old and wise enough to take on the responsibility? Can I handle it? And do I want to?

A year ago, while we were still in Canada for our last seder with the extended family, my little girl (then 6) asked my father (her Grandpa) the Four Questions. And she did it in three languages: Hebrew, French and Yiddish, given her education at an excellent Jewish day school in Montreal. Of course the rendition in Yiddish — a language which my generation not only mocked but spurned — was a great hit. Yiddishkeit had come full circle. How my grandfather would have loved to hear those questions, changed in that language! "Fur vuss ist die nacht . . ."

Thank God my own parents are very much alive, and I expect many years ahead of happy times with them, perhaps even some seders (if I win the Israeli national lottery). But this year will bring the excitement of its first seder for us as new immigrants to an ancient land — and to my sorrow, our first away from my whole family. If one wants to define the term "bittersweet," I expect that that's what those children of Israel whose parents are not in Israel will feel at this time of the year.

Tracking storks' routes

Jerusalem Dateline

Ornithologists in Israel have launched an ambitious project to monitor the migratory routes of storks via satellite.

Two storks were fitted with small transmitters following their capture last fall. The highly distinctive long-legged birds were captured while wading in marshes on Israel's coastal plain, presumably taking a rest en route between Europe and Africa.

"It wasn't easy catching them," admitted Haim Alfia of the Israel Raptor Centre. "We leapt out at them after they had landed in the marshes where they couldn't take off too quickly."

The project is sponsored jointly by the Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel, the Israel Raptor Centre and Germany's Max Planck Institute.

The transmitters weigh 50 grams, enabling the storks to carry them comfortably strapped to their backs. Signals will be relayed via the French satellite Ergos every 90 minutes pinpointing the storks' position to within 500 metres. The technology will provide especially useful information about the birds' habits in countries where little ornithological data is available.

Some 100 storks will be tagged with the satellite transmitters.

New Israeli space telescope to probe the heavens

Many mysteries of the universe are hidden in the dark, murky unknown. A new ultraviolet space telescope, designed and produced in Israel, will penetrate the heavens and advance the search for new stars, galaxies, and quasars. A co-operative effort between Tel Aviv University, the Israel Space Agency and El-Op Industries, it will be the probing "eyes" on a spacecraft that will blast off in 1995.

Israel won the bid for the payload on the multinational project — the first scientific mission to observe celestial objects in the ultraviolet range.

El-Op, Israel's electro-optics systems house, has earned an international reputation for its state-of-the-art military systems — day and night vision, infrared search and tracking, precision laser systems, airborne reconnaissance systems, etc. "We had the basic infrastructure to go into space technology," said Eytan Reis, head of business development for the space operation.

TAUVEX (Tel Aviv University UV Explorer is designed to fill an important gap in our knowledge of the universe. Astronomers have successfully tracked the stars in a large portion of the electromagnetic spectrum with visible light, radio waves, x-rays, and infrared radiation. But the exploration of the UV portion has been fragmentary.

"You cannot accurately observe the UV spectrum from the ground because the atmosphere scatters UV radiation," said Reis. "The only way to photograph distant and weak stars is by getting the scientific instrument out in space."

TAUVEX will zoom in on white dwarfs (young stars that emit high-energy ultraviolet radiation), binaries (stars that travel in pairs through space), galaxies, and quasars (the most luminous objects at the edge of the universe).

"The search for quasars will be the most productive ever concluded," said Dr. Noah Brosch, an astronomer at the Wise Observatory of Tel Aviv University. The observatory is the most active in the eastern Mediterranean basin. "We expect to catalogue more than 10,000 new quasars that will be identified by their UV-optical colors. Only about 4,000 are known today from ground-based surveys."

In addition, the space telescope will map the entire Virgo Cluster of galaxies as well as 100 angular-sized galaxies. Using information gained from the mission, scientists can study the physics of high-energy sources such as neutron stars and black holes. With the UV multicolored capability, scientists will gain unparalleled insight into mechanisms of star formation, composition, velocity, size, age, luminosity, and position. All this information will not only add to our knolwledge of the present state of the stars, their origin and past, but will also help in predicting their future.

The imager has three telescopes, two of them for scientific exploration. The third acts as a sensor of direction and drift on the satellite. This critical function is extremely important because the scientific work on the satellite requires long exposures.

Designed for a longer time-in-orbit than other shuttle-based imaging systems, the spacecraft will move in on elliptical orbit. Since its apogee will be 200,000 km. from the earth, it will take three days to orbit. A low-earth orbiting satellite usually orbits in one and a half hours. The satellite is expected to remain in space three years, which means that the telescopes have to be problem-free for this extended period.

TAUVEX ultraviolet telescope aids Israel's efforts in space exploration.

Winnipeg farmers 'lived like peasants'

holding grades 1 to 8, with one teacher. Frank was a fast learner and listened in as the teacher taught the higher grades, often completing two grades in one year.

There were always several Tennenhouse kids in the classroom and they got to school by horse and buggy or, in winter, by horse and sleigh. Frank said the sleigh rides were no fun when the temperature hit 40 below and the wind howled. "By the time we got to school, our hands and feet were numb, our cheeks and noses were peeling from frostbite and our lunch was frozen solid."

At home, "we lived like peasants. We grew our own vegetables, raised turkeys, geese and chickens (which were ritually slaughtered by a shochet in Winnipeg); my parents made cheese and sour cream, mother baked her own bread in a brick oven father built in the yard — European style. We ate well."

Frank completed pre-university schooling at the Stony Mountain high school. Several of the older brothers, attracted to the new-fangled auto industry in Detroit, left the farm to work there. One became a senior supervisor at Chrysler. Another used his beekeeping experience to become a major honey producer in the United States.

By 1950 only the parents remained on the farm. But Frank and the brothers who lived in the city came out daily to look after the livestock and do chores. The parents finally moved into Winnipeg, but were right back on the farm in the spring.

Russian reigns supreme at Weizmann Institute

Most scientists are recent immigrants

By LUBA VIKHANSKI
Special to The CJN

You don't have to know Russian to work at the Weizmann Institute, but these days it certainly helps. You can hear Russian all over the campus, and the language reigns supreme in some labs, such as the one headed by Dr. Levy Ulanovsky, where a prominent team of young researchers is developing novel technologies for deciphering genes.

While Ulanovsky was once a leading spokesman for refuseniks and an underground Hebrew teacher in Moscow, he has devoted himself entirely to science since coming to Israel in 1979. After earning his PhD at the Institute's Feinberg Graduate School and doing post-doctoral research with Nobel laureate Prof. Walter Gilbert at Harvard, he set up his own research group in Weizmann's Department of Structural Biology.

Everybody on his team happens to speak Russian, Ulanovsky explains, because when he started hiring people some three years ago, most available scientists were new immigrants from Russia. Between 1989 and 1993, some 8,000 scientists came to Israel from the former Soviet Union, and about 80 obtained positions in various Weizmann Institute departments.

Ulanovsky's group recently scored a major coup in increasing the efficiency of gene deciphering. Its researchers developed a method that may help automate this process, making it 20 to 50 times faster and drastically cheaper than existing techniques. This, in turn, would greatly accelerate the multinational Human Genome Project, an ambitious $3-billion, 15-year program intended to decode all human genes.

Ulanovsky says his research draws from several disciplines — molecular biology, physics and chemistry — all of which are represented in his group. He himself was trained in Moscow as an astrophysicist, but switched to studying the physical properties of DNA, the genetic material of life, while doing his doctorate at the Weizmann Institute with another former refusenik from Moscow, Prof. Edward Trifonov.

The chemist in his group is Dr. Lev Kotler, who, in his own words, landed at the Institute "through a fantastic stroke of luck." During a brief visit to an American company that had dealings with Russia, Ulanovsky heard about the research in biotechnology that Kotler was conducting in Moscow. He suggested that Kotler contact him upon his arrival in Israel. Two months after immigrating in 1990, Kotler joined Ulanovsky's team in Rehovot.

A second recent immigrant on the team is Dr. Irina Sobolev, who worked as a molecular biologist in Russia for 20 years until coming to Israel in 1991. Her physicist husband, Vladimir, is also working at the Institute.

Yet another member of the group is Alexander Beskin, who dropped his nearly completed doctoral studies at the Moscow Agricultural Institute of Biotechnology in order to emigrate to Israel in 1990. Beskin, who became an observant Jew and learned to speak fluent Hebrew while still in Moscow, is now working on his PhD under Ulanovsky's guidance.

In comparing their experiences in Russia and Israel, the immigrant researchers dwell on the similarities and differences. Sobolev, for example, had lived and worked in Pushchino-on-the-Oka, a town near Moscow that was home to some ten research institutions employing thousands of scientists. She says Pushchino was much like the Weizmann campus — small, scenic and dominated by academic life — which makes her feel quite at home here. The one big difference, predictably enough, is the freedom from government or political interference that Israeli scientists enjoy.

Beskin says one thing he was glad to leave behind in Russia was the anti-Semitism often experienced by Jewish scientists even after the advent of glasnost. For example, when three Jewish researchers were hired in his laboratory — a rare occurrence that was probably due to an oversight on the part of the administration — the institute director scolded the head of the research team for "turning his lab into a synagogue" and prohibited him from hiring any more Jews.

Beskin also recalls a period in the 1980s when his institute in Moscow had world-standard equipment, but with a peculiar twist. Every request for equipment had to be processed by a mammoth bureaucracy, which took about a year. By the time the equipment arrived, it was often no longer needed. The scientists would take it anyway and try to exchange it with colleagues for equipment or materials they needed at that moment. This created a barter system that consumed a large part of the scientists' time.

While Beskin, Kotler and Sobolev are working on the lab's main project, the speeded-up decoding of genes, the fifth member of Ulanovsky's team, Dr. Dina Zevin-Sonkin, is exploring new ground. She is trying to develop a method for observing genes via a fluorescent microscope with a resolution hundreds of times greater than is presently possible. If the project is successful, it should enormously facilitate the mapping of genes on chromosomes.

Zevin-Sonkin, who immigrated from Kiev in 1972 and pursued her PhD studies in molecular biology at the Weizmann Institute's Feinberg Graduate School headed a molecular biology project at Bar Ilan University for four years before returning to Weizmann.

When she and Ulanovsky were studying at Feinberg, there were about two dozen students from Russia. Now there are almost five times that number.

New Israeli space telescope to probe the heavens

Many mysteries of the universe are hidden in the dark, murky unknown. A new ultraviolet space telescope, designed and produced in Israel, will penetrate the heavens and advance the search for new stars, galaxies, and quasars. A co-operative effort between Tel Aviv University, the Israel Space Agency and El-Op Industries, it will be the probing "eyes" on a spacecraft that will blast off in 1995.

Israel won the bid for the payload on the multinational project — the first scientific mission to observe celestial objects in the ultraviolet range.

El-Op, Israel's electro-optics systems house, has earned an international reputation for its state-of-the-art military systems — day and night vision, infrared search and tracking, precision laser systems, airborne reconnaissance systems, etc. "We had the basic infrastructure to go into space technology," said Eytan Reis, head of business development for the space operation.

TAUVEX (Tel Aviv University UV Explorer is designed to fill an important gap in our knowledge of the universe. Astronomers have successfully tracked the stars in a large portion of the electromagnetic spectrum with visible light, radio waves, x-rays, and infrared radiation. But the exploration of the UV portion has been fragmentary.

"You cannot accurately observe the UV spectrum from the ground because the atmosphere scatters UV radiation," said Reis. "The only way to photograph distant and weak stars is by getting the scientific instrument out in space."

TAUVEX will zoom in on white dwarfs (young stars that emit high-energy ultraviolet radiation), binaries (stars that travel in pairs through space), galaxies, and quasars (the most luminous objects at the edge of the universe).

"The search for quasars will be the most productive ever concluded," said Dr. Noah Brosch, an astronomer at the Wise Observatory of Tel Aviv University. The observatory is the most active in the eastern Mediterranean basin. "We expect to catalogue more than 10,000 new quasars that will be identified by their UV-optical colors. Only about 4,000 are known today from ground-based surveys."

In addition, the space telescope will map the entire Virgo Cluster of galaxies as well as 100 angular-sized galaxies. Using information gained from the mission, scientists can study the physics of high-energy sources such as neutron stars and black holes. With the UV multicolored capability, scientists will gain unparalleled insight into mechanisms of star formation, composition, velocity, size, age, luminosity, and position. All this information will not only add to our knolwledge of the present state of the stars, their origin and past, but will also help in predicting their future.

The imager has three telescopes, two of them for scientific exploration. The third acts as a sensor of direction and drift on the satellite. This critical function is extremely important because the scientific work on the satellite requires long exposures.

Designed for a longer time-in-orbit than other shuttle-based imaging systems, the spacecraft will move in on elliptical orbit. Since its apogee will be 200,000 km. from the earth, it will take three days to orbit. A low-earth orbiting satellite usually orbits in one and a half hours. The satellite is expected to remain in space three years, which means that the telescopes have to be problem-free for this extended period.

TAUVEX ultraviolet telescope aids Israel's efforts in space exploration.

holding grades 1 to 8, with one teacher. Frank was a fast learner and listened in as the teacher taught the higher grades, often completing two grades in one year.

There were always several Tennenhouse kids in the classroom and they got to school by horse and buggy or, in winter, by horse and sleigh. Frank said the sleigh rides were no fun when the temperature hit 40 below and the wind howled. "By the time we got to school, our hands and feet were numb, our cheeks and noses were peeling from frostbite and our lunch was frozen solid."

At home, "we lived like peasants. We grew our own vegetables, raised turkeys, geese and chickens (which were ritually slaughtered by a shochet in Winnipeg); my parents made cheese and sour cream, mother baked her own bread in a brick oven father built in the yard — European style. We ate well."

Frank completed pre-university schooling at the Stony Mountain high school. Several of the older brothers, attracted to the new-fangled auto industry in Detroit, left the farm to work there. One became a senior supervisor at Chrysler. Another used his beekeeping experience to become a major honey producer in the United States.

Cabbagetown 'fixture' closes after 72 years

By JACK KOHANE
Special to The CJN

When Irv Walkin decided last year to close up his Cabbagetown shoe store, it signified the end of a fascinating era in Toronto's history. After nearly 3/4 of a century spent fitting footwear for many thousands of loyal customers, Irv knew the time had finally arrived to hang up the laces and shut his doors forever.

Among the many Jewish merchants who had plied their various trades in Cabbagetown — builders, bakers, grocers, and restaurateurs — Walkin Shoes was one of the first and most enduring, representing something of an institution in the city's east end.

Today, Irv returns only rarely to the store at 246 Parliament Street.

A large For Sale or Lease sign is draped across the front window. Where once there was the bustle of customers, and the lingering heavy aromas of leather and rubber, only the distant rumbling of trolley cars and passing trucks now break the unfamiliar stillness.

Several half-filled cardboard boxes line the far side. Some chairs still remain, but these are the last remnants. The rest of the portable assets have already been sold. Irv points out the ghostly outline of row upon row of fixtures that had once been filled to overflowing with merchandise bearing brand names such as Clarke, Savage, Buster Brown, Florsheim, North Star and Cougar. Irv recalls that the Buster Browns used to sell for $5.99 to $9.99, running shoes from $10 to $14 a pair. Stylish imports went for about $10.

At 69, Irv Walkin admits he is looking forward to a well-deserved retirement. He has no regrets looking back over the last seven decades.

Images of Cabbagetown include peaked roofs and gingerbread gables of Victorian-era houses now renovated by avant-garde artists and architects who reside here. The area boasts a dozen pubs, many of them as old as the city itself, and still serving up suds to thirsty patrons. There are the churches that harken back to the Irish Catholic and Protestant population that predominated in the community. Throughout its long history, Cabbagetown has been imbued with a hard-edged working class ambience.

As Irv reveals, there was also a substantial and vibrant Jewish culture here, of which only traces still exist. Irv relates the Walkin family background, which is typical of the Jewish experience in Toronto during the early part of the century.

David and Annie Walkominski, Irv's grandparents, lived in Grodna, a Russian steelmaking town about 40 miles from the Polish border. In 1911, they decided to leave their home along with their two sons, Morris and Sam, "mainly because of the pogroms that regularly raged across the country," Irv says. They came to Canada by boat, landing at Halifax harbor and then making their way on to Toronto. It was here that they anglicized their name and settled down.

David was a cobbler by trade, and it was he that founded the family shoe business in 1918. Walkin Shoes was the natural name and has remained the store's logo ever since.

The first shop was located at the southeast corner of Queen and Parliament Streets. In 1920, they moved to 267 Queen, 292 Queen in 1930, and 220 Queen in 1948. The last move came in 1968, when they located on Parliament.

As soon as they were old enough, Morris (Irv's father) and Sam went into the business full time. They were instrumental in maintaining and expanding Walkin Shoes over the years, at one point running three other stores.

"Dad knew instinctively what people looked for in footwear," comments Irv. "Customer satisfaction was the watchword and he made sure our clients left the store happy, with proper fitting shoes at a reasonable price."

Irv recalls the many long hours the family worked during the depression years to keep the enterprise viable. "We were open from nine in the morning until 11 p.m. This went on for much of the 1930s. It was tough times, but we managed to hold on to our customer base, many of whom knew our family. After all, shoes are a necessity of life despite harsh economic conditions."

Morris Walkin in front of Walkin Shoes, 267 Queen St. E., c. 1920.

Many of Irv's childhood memories centre around the ancient coke stove that heated the premises. It was rooted to the floor in the middle of the store. With a few lumps of coal and sticks of wood, the single blackened stove would emit shimmering waves of warmth that welcomed friends, neighbors and customers when they dropped by on a winter's day.

The stove was the social heart of the business. Every Monday, Irv recounts, like clockwork, the local salesman made his circuit of Cabbagetown shoestores. When he came to Walkin's, all would gather round the stove in eager anticipation to see and touch the newest styles he had to offer. Another memory is that the salesman would habitually spit on the stove top to watch it sizzle.

Friends and neighbors dropped by to chat with Morris and the family. Huddled in a tight circle about the stove, many stories were told about the old country and Talmudic discussions abounded as the stove's tiny flame grew higher and more intense.

Irv's imagination was stirred for hours on these occasions, stoked by the wonderfully vivid narratives told by the Pollack family, who owned the local sporting goods store, or the Ackermans who ran the paint shop down the road. Even the competition, Bill Lightman of Better Shoes was a friend often invited in.

Noon hour in the 1930s and '40s was reserved for Kaiman's Delicatessen at Queen and Sherbourne. Hungry folks from miles around would flock here because of the huge corned beef sandwiches served. Irv smacks his lips at the memory of it. "They prepared their meats in a special way — cooked in

New York lawyer creates new life for himself in B.C.

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

Most British Columbia law school graduates dream of having a large corner office overlooking the harbor or the mountains. But not Bob Friedland, who has been a lawyer since 1991.

His first office after being called to the bar was a renovated three-room trailer parked in the middle of a remote patch of land on an Indian reserve 100 kilometres west of Williams Lake, B.C., about seven hours by car north of Vancouver. There he opened the Nenqay Deni Yajelhtig Law Centre to provide free legal services to seven bands in the Anahan reserve. The centre, first of its kind, is funded by the provincial government.

His one-lawyer office served a large area geographically, "as big as Vancouver Island." In one year he had chalked up 160,000 kilometres by car to see his clients. "There was enough work for 10 lawyers," he told The CJN, "and the travelling was very wearing."

Operated by the Native Justice Council, it was a unique experience for Friedland and for British Columbia, and resulted in some important legal action for the Indians, said Friedland.

Cases ran from the "sublime to the ridiculous"— clients charged for phone calls they didn't make, to discrimination, land issues, car insurance claims, speed limits on the highway running through the reserve — and above all, alleged police brutality.

Friedland, 46, now a human rights lawyer in Victoria and newly-elected member of the Victoria city council, slugged it out with the highways ministry to get speed limit lowered from 90 kmh to between 50 kmh and 60 kmh. He feels his biggest success was to force a judicial inquiry into police brutality and how the B.C. justice system deals with natives.

Friedland moved to Victoria before the inquiry got under way. However, he drafted the terms of reference before he left and these were adopted by both the government and the native people.

Even though he had to chop wood to heat his office, Friedland said it was interesting and rewarding work. "Native people are getting a sense that the law can work for them — that they can achieve some goals through the legal process." His office computer was hooked into a database "and I had as much information available as any downtown Vancouver lawyer."

Bob Friedland

So what was a nice Jewish boy from New York City doing in the wilds of British Columbia.? After getting his BA from City University in New York, he headed west for a better way of life.

Wyoming looked good to him and he got his MA at the University of Wyoming, where he also taught English. Then he worked for the U.S. Department of Labor, investigating violations of labor in the state.

He then moved to the Federal Treasury Department, internal revenue division, investigating tax cheating. "Sort of a T-man," he explained.

But he was always attracted by what he perceived as a sense of community in Canada which didn't exist in the United States. His first wife's family was Canadian and he often had occasion to visit Alberta. Finally he decided to move to Edmonton and served as director of the Alberta Human Rights Commission in the southern part of the province.

After 20 years working for governments in semi-legal capacities he decided to take up law. He got his Canadian citizenship, attended and graduated from the University of Alberta Law School and articled in Vancouver, where he was called to the bar.

He says Alberta was a great place to live in during the '70s and early '80s under Premier Peter Lougheed. But things changed under Don Getty, he said, who was not as keen on the social services as Lougheed. He said he is quite distressed about the actions of the present Alberta government, even though he now lives in B.C.

Although he had always been progressively inclined, and his family had been politically inclined, he decided to become active in Canadian politics when John Turner became prime minister — a move which he perceived as a "turn to the right" for Canada.

Despite the fact he was a resident of Victoria for only a little over a year, his NDP connections won him a nomination and ultimately election to city council. And last November, he made news quickly. Somewhat unhappy with B.C. Premier Mike Harcourt, who he thinks has gone too far to appease the right, Friedland called for a phone-in vote on a leadership review, which has received some support.

At city hall he demanded an effort to employ visible minorities, and to appoint women to some of the top jobs — for example as city solicitor, a post which was open. He wants council to "send a message to city employers, who are being asked to participate in an employment equity program, that the city manager and mayor are willing to show leadership from the top down."

Later he called for council to replace the city police force with the RCMP because this, he said, would lower the cost of policing.

Does he miss New York? Well, he told The CJN, "I've been away from matzah ball soup for 20 years, and never went back." However, he promptly ordered the matzah ball soup on the Jewish Community Centre lunch menu and seemed to enjoy it. Anyways, he went on, the life he knew in New York is gone. "The area I grew up in, Brownsville, doesn't exist any more. The Dodgers are gone and the Giants are gone. Barbra Streisand and Woody Allen aren't in Flatbush now — so what's there to go back to?"

But Friedland is staying put, starting a new political career in a province where politics and politicians change as often as the weather. Victoria and maybe all of British Columbia will be hearing about this guy who says he has been "wandering in the wilderness."

Mount of Olives plan angers organizations

A plan recently submitted to the subcommittee for planning and construction of the Jerusalem municipality, is raising a storm of controversy.

If approved, the plan, calling for the reclassification of extensive tracts of church land on the Mount of Olives, would permit construction and expansion, to provide more facilities for the pilgrims and tourists who flock there in ever greater numbers.

Though there is no question that such facilities are badly needed, opponents of the plan argue that the Mount of Olives, which runs parallel to the Temple Mount to the East, beyond the Kidron Valley, is the last green zone of Jerusalem. Its summit is 800 metres above sea level and its fabulous skyline is very much a part of the city's image.

But as is very often the case in Jerusalem, there is more to the controversy than meets the eye. Biblical associations with the Mount of Olives make it sacred to Jews, and its role during the last days of Jesus makes it sacred to Christians.

Nobody knows when or how the Mount of Olives came by its name, since in biblical times most of the hills surrounding Jerusalem were covered with olive trees. Perhaps the trees of that area were finer than others. Certainly some of the gnarled, centuries-old specimens are impressive.

Since the oldest Jewish cemetery in the world, dating back nearly 2,500 years, is situated there, and according to Halachah, burial is not permitted inside cities, the Mount of Olives must have been well outside city limits during biblical times.

Jewish tradition has it that the olive branch brought to Noah by the dove to show him the flood was over, came from the Mount of Olives; here too, centuries later, King David, fleeing his son Absalom, is said to have stopped to kneel and pray. After the destruction of the Temple and of Jerusalem by the Romans, the Shechina, the Divine presence, was reported to have fled to the Mount of Olives, there to await the Day of Judgment: "And in that day his feet will stand on the Mount of Olives. . ." (Zechariah)

And it was here that for a number of centuries after that destruction, Jews would assemble for the traditional procession of Hoshanah Rabah on the seventh and last day of the Sukkot festival, for they were forbidden — at times under pain of death — to enter the Temple Mount.

Being troubled times, it was no longer possible to observe all three yearly pilgrimages. Sukkot was the only one to be widely kept — perhaps because the booths set up in observance of the law at Sukkot provided accommodation for pilgrims from all over the world. Conquerors came and went and still the annual pilgrimage took place, becoming, by the end of the ninth century, the most important event of the Jewish year.

A festive procession made its way to the summit of the Mount of Olives and circled it seven times, in memory of the seven Hakafot (circling with the Torah) that were made around the altar in the great Temple.

This was a day of great rejoicing and celebration when announcements of special interest to the Jewish world were made.

On July 15, 1099, the Crusaders stormed the walls of Jerusalem. The massacre that followed remains unparalleled in the long and bloody history of the city. Moslems and Jews, for once living together in peace, were slaughtered indiscriminately. There was no Sukkot celebration on the Mount of Olives that year or the next. Only memories and a few songs and prayers specially written for the occasion remained.

The Mount is sacred to Christians as well. According to the Christian Bible, Jesus entered Jerusalem on Palm Sunday from Bethphage on the Mount of Olives; it was in the garden of Gethsemane (from the Hebrew Gat Shmanim, the Olive Press) at the foot of the Mount, that he was arrested by Roman soldiers; and it was from the summit of the Mount that he ascended to heaven.

In the fourth century, a number of splendid churches were built to commemorate these events, notably the magnificent Basilica of the Ascension. But they were all destroyed by the Persian invaders in 614 CE, later to be rebuilt on a smaller scale. With the advent of the Crusaders in the late 11th century, new and more magnificent churches were built. But these too were largely destroyed in the late 12th century by the Islamic rulers of the city.

The Mount remained desolate for centuries. In the second part of the nineteenth century, renewed building of churches took place, the most conspicuous being the Russian church of Mary Magdalene, completed in 1888 and dedicated in the presence of Alexander III and his wife, Duchess Elisabeth. She was murdered in 1918 and a devoted monk recovered her body and brought the coffin, at great peril to himself, to Jerusalem. The duchess was laid to rest in 1921 in the church she had dedicated 33 years earlier.

Today there are a number of shrines on the Mount: the Church of the Ascension, the Church of Pater Noster, Dominus Flevit, the Tomb of the Virgin Mary, the crypt of Gethsemane and the Basilica of the Agony (better known as the Church of All Nations).

The lack of parking space, proper roads, and facilities in this area, is not an issue that will be easily resolved.

large vats and then pickled. Ummm, no one made it that way." He recalls the lunch special at Kaiman's — "2 sandwiches for 25 cents, soda pop at 6 cents a bottle." The restaurant only seated about 30 people and was jammed full all the time and a lineup for tables streamed out the doorway.

Religion was celebrated at the area's only synagogue, B'nai Israel Hamirachim Congregation, built in 1918 on Berkeley Street, just north of Queen. The government expropriated the land in the early 1960s to make room for low-rent Ontario housing. But Irv remembers it as a large edifice which served about 500 congregants. It was an Orthodox shul, especially renowned for its ladies auxiliary which knitted clothing and prepared meals for Jewish children.

David Walkin was an original member of B'nai Israel, and one of the family's most treasured momentos is the certificate of lifetime membership that he purchased in 1918.

Asked if he had encountered racism during those times, Irv replies, "Yes, there has always been an undercurrent of anti-Semitism in this city. I recall a sign at Kew Beach that proclaimed 'No dogs or Jews allowed.' Of course, that did not deter the Walkin family. We would go to the beach on a summer day, picnic baskets in hand, and eat our sandwiches along with the other folks. We were never molested."

Cabbagetown has undergone many changes over the 75 years that Walkin Shoes operated there. Businesses of all sorts have come and gone. Century-old stores and manufacturing plants have been converted into parking lots, trendy boutiques or antique furniture shops. The area is now imbued with a more Bohemian flavor.

As well, the Jewish people who came here from all points in Europe, who settled down, started businesses, and raised families, have also nearly disappeared from the Cabbagetown scene.

"Now, I too must be saying goodbye," Irv concludes our interview. He locks the creaking door behind us. How many memories can be crushed into a single moment of silent reflection?

Jewish journal joins information highway

TORONTO — Jewish Studies Judaica eJournal Publishing (JSJeJ) officially became the largest global provider of Jewish Studies services on the information superhighway this month.

The journal, which is edited and published out of Toronto, became the official sponsor of the New York State Educational Research Network's (NYSERNET) Israel Project Studies Gopher.

NYSERNET is a large educational organization in Troy, New York, which, among other activities, serves as a computer clearing house for most of the world's Jewish resources on the information superhighway — the Internet. Gopher is a term used to describe the international computer network software.

The non-profit JSJeJ has been publishing in Toronto since April 1993 in a joint venture with NYSERNET and the University of Illinois at Chicago History Department. It also maintains semi-official relations with the Canadian Jewish Historical Society and the Jewish Studies Program at Purdue University in Indiana.

The journal, along with a print-journal abstracting service, is provided free of charge to anyone in the world with electronic mail capability.

Devoted to on-going research and current events in Jewish Studies, the JSJeJ now has one of the largest circulations for any electronic journal available in any discipline.

Despite its international editorial board, the JSJeJ's largest contingent is from Toronto — including Drs. Henry Abramson and Leslie Train, and York University doctoral candidate Mark Flumerfelt. The editor is Avi Hyman, a doctoral candidate at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education.

The new Gopher service, which on a computer screen resembles a local library catalogue, provides users with direct links to world-wide library holdings, on-line texts and articles, information about Jewish Studies programs at universities around the world, and other useful resources, including information about grants, awards, and scholarships.

The journal's publishers began the new service as a place to store back issues of the JSJeJ, but demand led to an expansion of services. The new service also has direct links to other Jewish resources such as singles registries, Jewish Federation databanks, and discussion groups on everything from Halachah to music to newswire service from Israel.

Information on the Jewish Studies Judaica eJournal or its Gopher services can be easily acquired by sending an electronic mail letter to: jewstudies@israel.nysernet.org.

Hamilton students take part in public speaking contest

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Standing up before a crowd and making a speech is evidently a good deal more fun than sitting alone by a desk and writing an essay.

At least, that's what a lot of kids seem to think. How else to explain the growing popularity of the annual Morris Black Public Speaking Contest? Its predecessor, the Morris Black Essay Contest, all but faded for lack of interest.

The contest, named after the late Peterborough businessman whose son moved to the Hamilton area in the late 1970s, is now sponsored jointly with Hamilton Hadassah-WIZO public affairs and the Jewish Community Centre.

This year, a record 65 students took part, and what with parents, siblings, grandparents and other relatives and friends, the JCC was jammed for the occasion, reported contest judge Dr. Rick Black.

The contest, which is open to all Hamilton area Jewish students in Grades 4 to 9 is a good Jewish cultural event for kids," said JCC executive director Neil Silvert.

Topics ranged from My Favorite Jewish Person or Famous Jews in History, to the Holocaust, Jewish education, politics of the Middle East and on how synagogues can keep young people interested.

"The kids were phenomenal," and judging, Black and Silvert agree, "was extremely difficult."

Prizes of $75, $50 and $25 were awarded for each grade. This year's winners included many ties.

For Grade 4, Mordechai Walfish and Sam Waserman took first; Daniel Ludwin and Dina Randor took second; and Erica Larry, Catherine Kates, Donna Lieberman took third.

Grade 5: Jessica Waserman, Jason Silvert, first; Hillary Schneider, Aryeh Westreich, second; Andrea Shragge, Daniel Majonis, third.

Grade 6: Aubrey Levy, Ari Black, first; Lara Hart, Laurie Fainer, Bryon Waxman, second; Reesa Barrs, Galya Randor, third.

Grade 7: Adrian Ludwin, first; Deena Schiff, second; Adam Waltman, third.

Grade 8: Leah Loewith, first; Lee Haripko, second.

Grade 9: Naomi Loewith and Mory Black tied for first place.

BGU professor stresses link between religion, politics

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Stereotypes don't apply to David Newman. The Ben-Gurion University professor of political geography, currently spending a year in Calgary, grew up in London, England, the son of an Orthodox rabbi. He stopped wearing a kippah a few years ago — more for political than religious reasons, he says.

Newman recently received a major academic grant to undertake joint research with Palestinian geographers on possible boundaries for Israel and the West Bank.

Newman challenges the right-wing political views of many Orthodox Israelis. He also challenges the intertwining of religion and politics in Israel, a "pet topic" of his and the subject of his recent talk to a group of New Israel Fund supporters in Toronto.

The recent Hebron massacre serves as evidence that religion and politics are closely linked and must be defined within the context of each other, Newman said.

At the synagogue Newman attends in Metar, a small community north of Be'ersheva, posters were hung calling for demonstrations against the change of Israeli government. "I fully accept that I'm a minority within the religious community," said Newman, "but no one should feel uncomfortable at shul because something offends their perspective."

Newman made his concerns known to the local mayor, whom he described as a "religious personality," as well as to the rabbi ("right wing but a nice guy").

David Newman

"The mayor said I was quite right," recalls Newman. "[The shul] is a religious establishment getting public funds. It should not be having political statements. The rabbi took great offence to what he saw as local government intervention."

Newman noted that his children attended the religious school in Metar, from which they emerged with "very strong political messages imprinted on their minds."

The religious population in Israel is growing, Newman said. Religious olim represent a disproportionate percentage of immigration and 20 to 30 per cent of the Israeli population define themselves as religious, he said, although probably 40 to 50 per cent do not vote for religious parties.

In ultra-religious communities, noted Newman, the rabbi's views are not questioned. As the son of a rabbi, "I don't have that kind of hang-up," he said. "[In ultra-Orthodox communities,] if a rabbi says black is white, then black is white. This is one aspect of the general politicization in Israel...It becomes a very fundamentalistic message." The Hebron killing stemmed from "a very fundamentalist outlook," Newman said.

"I always argue that the two most powerful political leaders in Israel are probably Rabbi [Eliezer] Schach [leader of the ultra-Orthodox Shas party] and Rabbi Ovadia Yoseph [Sephardi Chief Rabbi of Israel]. Thirty thousand people vote the way they say. No Bibi Netanyahu commands that type of political power," said Newman.

The last 20 years have seen a few moderate religious groups in Israel, he noted. Oz V'Shalom, the "precursor of the religious peace movement, very clearly came out of academia, and even more, out of the European academic community," Newman said.

A lot of people, according to Newman, see no need for religious political parties even if they support their political agenda. "The problem with religious parties [which generally hold 12 to 18 seats in the Knesset] is you're saying to society that we're separate on many other issues."

"In Israel we're all very stereotyped," said Newman. "They don't know how to deal with people like myself who are religious but left wing."

Educators debate need to link Jewish, secular studies

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN

TORONTO — Whether or not to bridge Jewish and secular studies in the Jewish day schools is an issue that has been addressed by educators of all denominations, says the director of Torah U'Mada Project of Yeshiva University.

"The assumption is that bridging is good and separation is bad, but this is not a universally accepted idea. For some educators, compartmentalization is fine," Rabbi Jacob Schacter said at the recent Mini-Caje, a professional development day for teachers in day schools and supplementary Hebrew schools, held under the auspices of the Toronto Board of Jewish Education and the Centre of Jewish Studies, York University.

Rabbi Schacter said all educators should bring different pieces together in one system. "We want different pieces of our lives to live in harmony with each other but figuring out how to bring the two realms together is by no means a new issue. The problem has persisted decade after decade, and continues to persist, because deep down, many Jewish educators believe that compartmentalization represents a part of our tradition."

He said we pay a heavy price for not attempting to bridge secular and Jewish studies. "When subjects are not bridged, students see their worlds as being naturally exclusive and irrelevant to one another. If there is no model of integration, they are left with no clue of what one part of their studies had to do with the other. Bridging is a necessity in order to be successful in the 20th century."

Rabbi Schacter said schools could bridge secular and Jewish studies either by having courses team-taught or by integrating the entire curriculum.

"Stressing a school's community by offering such things as dances, clubs, choir and other programs, goes a long way in giving children the understanding that such Judaic and secular studies have something to say in the real world. Which ever way it is done, it is critically important for modern Jewish day schools to make the efforts to bridge. It is crucial in order to turn out good people."

Disabled athletes join the Games

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — For the first time, disabled athletes will participate as full-fledged members of their national teams and get the same medals and honors as other athletes at the Commonwealth Games being held here in August.

Amy Hart, spokeswoman for the Games, told The CJN more than 100 athletes with disabilities, representing 13 Commonwealth countries, will compete. Regulations governing events for athletes with a disability are the same as for other events, except in lawn bowls where bowlers will have coaches to provide verbal instructions about the placement of the bowls.

There are six events including men's 800-metre wheelchair race, men's wheelchair marathon, men's 100-metre freestyle swim, women's 100-metre freestyle swim, men's singles lawn bowls for visually impaired and women's singles lawn bowls for visually impaired.

Anti-Semitism resurfaces as communism declines

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — After the fall of repressive Communist regimes, deeply embedded anti-Semitism surfaced in many eastern European countries, whether or not there were any Jews among their populations, a former senior foreign affairs columnist for the New York Times told a York University audience recently.

Flora Lewis was speaking on The New Nationalism and the Rise of Anti-Semitism, one of two Leonard Wolinsky lectures given on the same afternoon. The other was presented by Mount Holyoke College historian Michael Burns, the author of a biography of Alfred Dreyfus.

This year marks the 100th anniversary of the beginning of the notorious Dreyfus Affair in France, which saw the only Jew on the General Staff of the French army convicted of treason in a trial contaminated by anti-Semitism.

Lewis said the lifting of the restraints of communism in Romania, where there are few Jews, and in Hungary, where there is a substantial Jewish population of 100,000, not only resulted in an increase in nationalism, but unleashed talk of Jewish conspiracies in both countries.

Istvan Csurka, a former leading member of the governing Hungarian Democratic Front, is a right-wing nationalist who is all but openly anti-Semitic, Lewis said. A playwright and journalist, he recently produced "a manifesto of new vintage Hungarian Nazi ideology."

Vocal opposition in Hungary

He urged, she said, that a Hungarian "volkisch" (the German word for national) economic policy be created. "He says, and I quote, 'We cannot adopt a non-volkisch policy just because the term volk sounds suspect in some ears.' That is a very clear innuendo of a Nazi policy."

Lewis noted that there is vocal opposition in Hungary to these ideas. (Csurka has since left the party to form his own.)

She disputed the notion that the revival of nationalism in eastern Europe is a knee-jerk reaction to the fall of communism. Rather, she said, as countries experience economic problems and societal tensions, there is the temptation to use nationalism with greater and greater "rabidness."

Dreyfus convicted of treason

Lewis took issue with what she called the widespread effort to interpret the strong showing by ultra-nationalist Vladimir Zhirinovsky in the recent Russian election as a general protest vote against rising crime and violence and the way in which economic reform is hurting ordinary people.

She warned that Zhirinovsky must be taken seriously, "not because he is likely to come to power — we don't know — but the time to stop him is before he represents an overwhelming menace. He sounds like a clown, like a kook; so did Hitler to a lot of reasonable people."

Lewis noted that Zhirinovsky had told a Swedish interviewer he liked being compared to Hitler because he felt Hitler was a model for a way to power.

* * *

Captain Alfred Dreyfus was charged with, and subsequently convicted of treason after a hasty investigation that produced no hard evidence. After spending four years in the notorious French prison on Devil's Island, Dreyfus was retried because new evidence pointed to the guilt of another officer.

Dreyfus was, nevertheless, convicted again. Following a storm of protest led by the French novelist Emile Zola, he was pardoned because the government feared an international boycott of the upcoming World Fair in France.

Seven years later a new French government proclaimed his innocence, reinstated him into the army and awarded him the Legion of Honor.

Some Dreyfus supporters, as well as the highly assimilated Dreyfus family, had looked to France for protection, Burns said. Matthew Dreyfus thought his brother's ordeal was a judicial error. Others sided with Jewish nationalist Bernard Lazare, who blamed anti-Semitism and could no longer believe in the premise of the sanctuary of the state.

Dreyfus believed he had been wrongfully charged because he was Jewish. Burns recounted that during his first night in prison, Dreyfus shouted, "My only crime is to be born a Jew." However, throughout his ordeal and until the end of his life, Dreyfus's loyalty to France was unswerving.

"There was a profound difference between recognizing the existence of anti-Semitism in France, which Dreyfus did, and defining France as anti-Semitic, which Dreyfus refused to do," said Burns.

"This is only one of the many themes, tensions, debates that link the Dreyfus affair to our own time."

Key to the Future's Ida Feiberg with a male candidate. [WZPS photo]

Matchmaker, matchmaker...

World Zionist Press Service

Russian aliyah is characterized not only by a preponderance of academics but by an extraordinary percentage of single women.

Russian-born piano teacher Ida Feiberg, who made aliyah from St. Petersburg in 1990 with her husband and three children, wanted to help these women fit into Israeli society.

She began introducing single Russian immigrant women, such as those she met daily in her Hebrew ulpan class, to established Israeli gentlemen.

Six years after first moonlighting as a matchmaker from her Holon apartment, Feiberg's venture, Key to the Future, has taken off into a highly successful cross-cultural dating service.

"At first, most women emphasized economic stability," said Feiberg. "But now that they're more established economically, personal attributes are more important.

"Being a matchmaker, though, I still check into the finances of my male clients — things like salary, where he lives, whether his parents are able to help him get established, etc."

The men Feiberg seeks for her women must also be polite and educated. "If I'm impressed with how he speaks, acts and looks, I register him. I generally don't work with unsophisticated men, but if someone is a blue-collar worker who loves to read, go to the theatre and listen to classical music, there's no problem."

She conducts initial interviews by phone and using her musical background, analyzes the appliant's voice, paying attention to intonations and manner of speech. If a caller passes the test, he or she is invited for a personal interview.

The service's first year resulted in only four marriages, says Feiberg. But with an increasing number of referrals and growing experience in choosing likely candidates, things began to pick up. Feiberg presently has some 500 women, ages 18 to 60, and 100 men, aged 24 to 68, on her books.

Computer firm owner Moshe, 32, met 22-year-old nursing student Irina through Feiberg: "I called other Russian-run agencies and advertised in the newspaper, but had no success. Ida's personal and direct approach appealed to me. She based her decisions on intuition, not on computers. It reminded me of the classic matchmaker."

After a five-month, whirlwind romance, Moshe and Irina were married.

Why, though, a Russian mate?

Moshe's decision grew out of positive experiences with Russian immigrants. "My father also has a lot of empathy for immigrants. He vividly remembers the difficulties he faced as a new immigrant from Poland. But I don't feel like I'm Irina's savior or guide," stressed Moshe. "She's far from helpless and can teach me a thing or two."

Feiberg agrees. "Many potential male partners are attracted by the fact that most Russians are educated and cultured. But many men also seek my services because they find Russian women to be more reserved and conservative and less assertive than Israeli women."

Russian immigrants Olga, a 52-year-old doctor, and her twentysomething daughter Larisa, asked Feiberg to help them meet suitable men. While Larisa hasn't had much luck, her mother is engaged to Rachamim, a 60-year-old Sabra of Yemennite origin.

"I've been divorced for many years," said Rachamim, an independently-employed technician. "I have been out with many Israeli women and I'm now finally ready for a partner to share my life with. I'm rather choosy and not an easy person to get along with. But Olga and I are very happy together. I'm a life-saver for her and she's a life-saver for me."

The registration fee for women is a nominal $80. A $300 registration fee for men serves to filter out low-income candidates. And, if the couple decide to marry, Feiberg receives a $1,000 matchmaker's fee. "I have an average of one wedding a month," she said.

A recent article on Key to the Future in an Atlanta newspaper precipitated a letter from an unattached American Jew requesting Feiberg's services in finding him a Russian bride. The request sparked her imagination. "Maybe one day I'll have an international matchmaking network which will link single Jews around the world," she smiled.

Greek artifacts found

Jerusalem Dateline

Recent archeological excavations carried out at the ancient port of Yavneh Yam or Jamnia, just south of Tel Aviv, have revived the age-old archeological question: just when did Greek culture begin to spread into ancient Israel and the rest of the Fertile Crescent?

It was once assumed that Greek culture became widespread with the conquest of the Middle East by Alexander the Great in 330 BCE. But every once in a while archeologists unearth pre-Hellenistic Greek artifacts, supporting a growing body of evidence that Greek culture had already established itself prior to the Age of Alexander.

The dig at Yavneh Yam — a site stretching back to the Bronze Age but almost untouched by archeological teams — was headed by Israeli archeologist Dr. Moshe Fischer.

Yavneh Yam, or Jamnia, is located on the Mediterranean Coast between the ancient ports of Jaffa and Ashdod. The settlement's natural harbor was used extensively, with underwater excavations revealing objects dating from the first half of the second millennium BCE to the Early Muslim Period (700-1100 CE). These finds include anchors, fishing equipment and a lead brazier used by Roman sailing vessels.

Students of the Department of Classical Studies at Tel Aviv University excavated earthenware imported from Rhodes or Pergamon and other Greek cities in the harbor area. The objects including Megarian bowls characteristic of the 3rd and 2nd centuries BCE, when ancient Israel was still under Persian rule. Large wine amphoras with stamped handles common in Rhodes, Chios and Kos were also found. The vessels indicate the presence of a large Hellenized population in Jamnia.

One of the most impressive finds from this period was a statuette of a girl playing a harp. Among the other Greek findings at the site were ceramic jars and two types of oil lamps of clearly Greek origin or inspiration, and potsherds decorated with mythological figures in the red-figure style characteristic of the 5th and 4th centuries BCE.

The discovery of an almost whole jug of East Greek character dating back to the 7th century BCE points towards even earlier connections with the Greek world.

Pollard decision shocks supporters

His fiancee Elaine Zeitz vows to keep up fight

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The voice of the normally steely Elaine Zeitz trembles as she chokes back tears.

Despite the haze of raw emotion in which she finds herself, Zeitz is clear in her belief that last week's refusal by U.S. President Bill Clinton to grant clemency to her fiance, imprisoned spy Jonathan Pollard, has "obvious" parallels to Passover — a "pharoah" who won't relent, despite years of pressure from the Jewish people.

The biblical Pharoah was eventually brought to his knees by the wrath of G-d; so too is Zeitz convinced that one day, justice will be done for Pollard, her betrothed for the past three years.

The Toronto-based Zeitz, who is also Canadian spokesperson for Citizens for Justice for Jonathan Pollard was naturally shocked at Clinton's decision to deny Pollard commutation of his life sentence. But beyond that, the sudden White House announcement left her angry and bewildered.

For one thing, according to the Jewish Telegraphic Agency (JTA), Clinton's decision came less than four hours after White House spokeswoman Dee Dee Myers said the Justice Department's recommendation in the Pollard case had not yet been reviewed by the president.

Clinton explained his decision in a statement issued late last Wednesday afternoon. He noted that the former Navy analyst who spied for Israel had committed "one of the most serious crimes against our country — placing national security secrets of the United States in the hands of another country."

Clinton said his judgment reflected the recommendation of U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno and "the unanimous views of the law enforcement and national security agencies."

He said he based his decision "upon the grave nature" of Pollard's offence and "the considerable damage that his actions caused our nation."

For years, Jewish groups in the United States and Canada and around the world have pressed three successive U.S. administrations to review Pollard's life term, which they see as overly harsh.

Their argument has centred around the government's alleged reneging on a promise of leniency in return for a guilty plea, and the fact Pollard spied for an ally and was never charged with treason. Charges of dual loyalty came into play, as Pollard, a Jew, was said to be motivated by his concern for Israel. Anti-Semitism was always viewed as a factor.

In December, the White House sent up a trial balloon. Rumors were rampant that Clinton was considering a Christmas time pardon.

In his statement, the president said he had considered the argument that Pollard deserved a shorter prison sentence because he spied for a friendly nation.

"I nevertheless believe that the enormity of Mr. Pollard's crime, the harm his actions caused to our country and the need to deter every person who might even consider such actions, warrant his continued incarceration," the president said.

As far as Zeitz is concerned, Clinton's action was "a slap in the face" to the Jewish community, given that the president received 88 per cent of the Jewish vote; and to Israel, inasmuch as Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin personally asked Clinton to grant clemency. "Rabin was set up," she stated.

The president acted in a "high-handed, arrogant, short-sighted, totally shocking" manner, she charged. "He's very good at lighting Chanukah candles, but when it comes to justice...

"His administration has been notorious for ignoring Jewish concerns. And now this totally undermines Israel. What kind of hope is there for the United States to be an honest broker in the Middle East? It has damaged the peace process."

In denying clemency, Clinton has also "ignored" pleas for leniency for Pollard from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), several Christian groups, law professors, virtually every rabbi in North America and members of Congress from both parties, Zeitz notes.

Zeitz finds it odd that Clinton reached a decision only hours after his aide announced he had not yet read the Attorney General's report on Pollard.

As for Pollard, he was "extremely disappointed ... very, very shocked" at Clinton's decision, said Zeitz, who speaks to her fiance every day and was scheduled to spend the last two days of Passover with him.

The White House announcement came in the wake of the arrest of Aldrich Ames, a former CIA employee charged with spying for the Soviet Union and later, Russia. Speculation that the administration was disinclined to show any leniency to a convicted spy at this time is a "smokescreen," Zeitz said, adding she feels, as do others, that some of the allegations against Pollard can be traced to Ames's activities.

Clinton's decision was "a punch in the stomach," remarked Helen Smolack, president of the Toronto Zionist Council, one of the leading pro-Pollard groups in Canada.

Jews everywhere "shouldn't acquiesce" to Clinton's decision, but keep up protests and press the president to reconsider, she added.

Pollard was arrested while trying to seek refuge in Washington's Israeli Embassy in November 1985. He was indicted by a grand jury on one count of passing secrets to an ally. He then agreed to a plea bargain: in return for leniency for himself and his then-wife and co-accused, Anne, he would forgo a public trial in favor of an in camera hearing.

In 1987, he was sentenced to life imprisonment and has spent his years in some of the toughest jails in the United States, mostly in solitary confinement.

Zeitz believes Pollard's chances for parole are "moot," since in Pollard's file is an influential letter from former U.S. secretary of defence Caspar Weinberger, recommending against parole.

According to one published report, Pollard will be eligible for parole in November 1995. However, under Justice Department guidelines, his release is unlikely until the year 2015.

All of Pollard's legal avenues have been exhausted.

His supporters in the United States say their new goal is to ensure that Pollard is released in November of next year.

Finta will not be retried

But war crimes legislation is held to be constitutional

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish community activists and Justice Department officials agree that last week's Supreme Court decision in the Imre Finta case will make it harder to prosecute and convict those suspected of Nazi war crimes.

The 4-3 judgment released last week upholds the constitutionality of the legislation that permits the criminal prosecution of Nazi war criminals in Canada. But the High Court refused to order a new trial for former Hungarian gendarmerie captain Imre Finta.

Finta was charged with robbery, forcible confinement, kidnapping and manslaughter in connection with the round up and deportation of 8,617 Jews in the southern Hungarian city of Szeged in June 1944. His acquittal at trial was upheld by the Ontario Court of Appeal.

"As a general statement, [the Supreme Court decision] simply makes it harder to prove these cases," said Chris Amerasinghe, the Justice Department lawyer who prosecuted Finta. "You have to prove more elements to a jury."

"The law as interpreted by the majority will cause problems," said David Matas, chair of B'nai Brith's war crimes committee. "It will be a lot harder to get a conviction."

"I think it's clear that the majority opinion sets a pretty high standard in terms of opening up defences that were questionable as to their applicability [before the decision]," said Jack Silverstone, general counsel for Canadian Jewish Congress.

It will be particularly difficult to get a conviction against "a functionary doing his duty in a non-violent way," Silverstone said. "But I don't think it would preclude a conviction of someone committing an outrageous and blatant offence, like shooting civilians."

Sabina Citron, vice-chair of the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association (CHRA), said the organization's membership is "devastated" by the decision. She said, however, the war crimes unit no longer has any excuse for "foot-dragging" when it comes to launching new prosecutions.

In its decision, the Supreme Court rejected defence lawyer Doug Christie's contention that Canadian courts did not have jurisdiction over crimes committed abroad more than 45 years ago or that the law was too vague.

But in examining the elements of the offence, the court imposed a "double criminality element," said Matas, who represented B'nai Brith as an intervener in the case. Not only must the Crown prove that suspects had the requisite intent to commit the crimes in question, they must also show they knew that what they were doing amounted to a violation of international law. Leaving that technical, legal element in the hands of the jury will make it very difficult to get a conviction, Matas said.

Writing for the minority, Justice Peter Cory said, "The approach taken in the courts below leads to the following incongruous result. War crimes and crimes against humanity were viewed as so heinous as to require a procedure so unmanageable as to make successful prosecution unlikely."

Palestinians drifting away from peace

Arafat losing support

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The suspension of peace talks between the PLO and Israel had nothing to do with the Hebron massacre, but was symptomatic of a shift away from the peace process in the Palestinian camp, the opening session of Canadian Jewish Congress' 28th regional plenary was told recently.

PLO chair Yasser Arafat pulled out of the talks because he is losing support within the Palestinian community for the peace process, said Alexander Bligh, an adviser on Arab affairs to former Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir. Recent elections among Palestinian legal associations, trade unions, university faculty, student groups and other organizations have returned an overwhelming number of Hamas members. This is a clear signal that support for the peace process is diminishing, he said.

Speaking before about 400 people at the Lipa Green Building, Bligh presented a generally pessimistic assessment of the chances for peace. Referring to a recent survey among Palestinians, he said the poll shows that 70 per cent support Hamas, Islamic Jihad or PLO factions that oppose peace with Israel.

Lack of support among his own constituency prompted Arafat to withdraw from peace talks, Bligh, a visiting professor at York University, continued. Furthermore, Israel is helping feed the fire of extremism by releasing 1,000 Palestinian prisoners, many of them condemned terrorists.

To the sound of some catcalls from the audience, Bligh called for "a policy of the iron fist" against all terrorists, whether Arab or Jewish.

Abraham Diskin, a consultant to both Labor and Likud governments, called for Israeli and Diaspora support of the peace process. "But at the same time, I really don't believe that this process will bring real peace to Israel," he said.

Arab terrorism will continue for the next 50 years, Diskin, a visiting scholar at Carleton University, predicted.

Alexander Bligh

The PLO agreed to talks with Israel "out of desperation" because of its disastrous backing of Saddam Hussein during the Gulf War and because of the collapse of its Soviet patron.

Bernard Reich

While repeating his concerns about Israel's Palestinian negotiating partner, he said it was "refreshing" to hear the PLO say they no longer wanted to eliminate Israel.

Despite his pessimism, he said he backed negotiations wholeheartedly if only to lead Israel to divest itself of authority over a large Arab population. No matter how liberally Israel may behave, it cannot have "millions of Arabs without citizenship living under de facto martial law," he said.

"Israel was established to be a Jewish, democratic state" and to accomplish that, it must separate itself from the large Arab population it controls, he added.

The U.S. perspective on the peace talks was presented by Bernard Reich, a professor of international politics at George Washington University. Reich, who has served as consultant to the U.S. State Department, suggested U.S. foreign policy on the Mideast was rudderless.

Abraham Diskin

The administration wants peace between Israel and its neighbors, an end to terrorism and to the Arab boycott of Israel, but it has no idea how to attain these goals, he said.

U.S. president Bill Clinton was elected on a domestic agenda and he knows peace in the Middle East will not necessarily ensure his re-election, he said.

He feels the United States overreacted to the Hebron massacre when it agreed not to veto a UN resolution that described Jerusalem in its preamble as "occupied" territory. That amounted to a change of the terms of the Sept. 13 Declaration of Principles, he said.

The administration has good intentions and is friendly to Israel but it is preoccupied with domestic crises and it "does not know how to get from square A to square B."

The panelists were introduced by plenary chair Joyce Eklove.

The regional plenary, whose motto is "Koach — from strength to strength," is part of the activities marking Congress' 75th anniversary.

Apathy, ignorance hurt community, says CJC president

By AMY SATTIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Apathy and ignorance are sapping the Canadian Jewish community of its strength, community leaders told a gathering of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, last week.

"We must convert alienation to action, passivity to pride," thundered national Congress president Irving Abella before 130 Congress members at the 28th regional plenary.

Abella was one of three speakers at an abbreviated luncheon plenary, along with Rabbi Mark Dratch of Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue and Prof. Gerald Tulchinsky of Queen's University. They could not take questions because the 90-minute session ran overtime.

Abella said it was the responsibility of the older generations to keep younger Jews affiliated with the community. He cited the high assimilation and intermarriage rates in the United States as a warning of what might happen in Canada if the Jewish community doesn't try harder to keep its young involved.

He said the young find their communities elsewhere — at school, the office, with like-minded friends — instead of identifying with the Jewish community. It is only "when Israel is threatened or the family gathers" that they acknowledge their Judaism, often with "pangs of guilt."

Rabbi Dratch said only through questioning will the younger generation learn to remain Jewish. He too put that burden of responsibility on the older members of the audience.

"We've lost the art of questioning. Many Jews don't care to ask [about why it is important to be Jewish]."

Referring to the Passover Haggadah, he said, "Remember, even worse than the wicked child is the child who doesn't know how to ask a question."

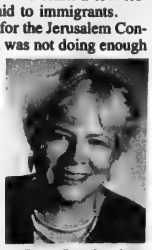
Mayor praises Israeli program

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — Toronto Mayor June Rowlands has said the Canadian government could learn a few lessons from Israel in providing aid to immigrants.

Rowlands, in Israel last week for the Jerusalem Conference of Mayors, said Canada was not doing enough to service the estimated 30,000 to 40,000 immigrants arriving in Toronto every year.



June Rowlands

After her visit to a Jerusalem absorption centre, the mayor said she was impressed by the six-month intensive language instruction for all new immigrants and recommended the federal government in Canada adopt a similar program.

"There is an intensive effort to try to teach people the values and language of the country. By the time they complete this program they have a working knowledge of how to get around. This is something that we, in Canada, are not doing — and I think it is a great mistake," said Rowlands.

"Israeli authorities believe that in the long run it costs the state less money to provide a six-month orientation program to immigrants because it enables them to find jobs and integrate more quickly. It's an outstanding system."

Rowlands was one of 30 mayors from around the world to attend the Jerusalem Conference of Mayors, an annual event to explore topics of common interest. The Toronto mayor said she never thought of cancelling her trip despite warnings about the tense atmosphere in Israel following the Hebron massacre. "I feel safer here than in most North American cities," she said. "It is one of the safest place in the world."

Rowlands also told The CJN she supported a united Jerusalem under Israeli control. "Speaking not as mayor, but as a private person, I do not believe the city should be split or administered jointly. As we have seen with the case of Berlin, that sort of thing just doesn't work. I think Jerusalem should remain united as it is today," she said.

Reform Party, CJC leaders hold 'productive' meeting

Racism, immigration on the agenda

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — Reform party leader Preston Manning and Irving Abella, president of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), met for the first time last week in Ottawa for what both agreed was a productive discussion on issues that concern the Jewish community.

After meeting with Manning, Abella said he was convinced that the Reform leader will not tolerate racism or anti-Semitism in the party.

"Mr. Manning is a very impressive man and I think his heart is in the right [place]," Abella said after the meeting. "We're concerned about some of the people in the Reform party, some of the things they've said and continue to say. But his indication was that he would be trying to keep these people under control and make sure they don't speak on behalf of the party."

Manning acknowledged the concern about racist elements in the Reform party.

"Congress is extremely concerned about racists and anti-Semitic people that try to infiltrate political parties, and particularly new ones," Manning told reporters, "and we've done a lot to prevent that happening to the Reform party."

Abella said he agreed to keep Manning informed of any racists or "trouble makers" in the party who come to the attention of Congress.

The CJC delegation, which included Abella; Eric Vernon, director of legislative analysis; and Manny Shacter, chair of CJC Quebec region, met with Manning to let him know about issues that are important to Congress and the Jewish community. They talked about immigration and multiculturalism, prosecution of Nazi war criminals, racism and the role of the Reform party in Quebec.

Abella told Manning that the Reform party's immigration and multiculturalism policies implied an intolerance for certain minority immigrants. Reform policy calls for immigrants to be selected on the basis of Canada's economic needs. But, Abella said Manning assured them that the party does not want to discriminate against any group; it simply wants immigration to be compatible with the current economic climate. And while Manning supports a cultural mosaic, he doesn't believe the government should spend money to preserve it.

"The concern was that there is really a subtext in this and you've got to be careful," Abella said later. "This is a country of immigrants, which hates immigration and [the Reform party] is playing up to that feeling. And [Manning] realized that."

Abella said he explained that hundreds of studies have concluded that immigrants benefit rather than drain the economy. Manning agreed to meet with representatives of CJC again within the next few months.

Abella said he was especially pleased with Manning's support on the question of prosecuting Nazi war criminals in Canada, a process Congress believes has been too slow. Although Manning was not well-informed about the issue from the point of view of the Jewish community, said Abella, once it was explained to him, he agreed to put pressure on the government by asking questions in the House about the prosecution of war criminals.

Manning also told the Congress delegation that his party wants to run candidates in Quebec and will be discussing that possibility at its October convention.

Asked whether the meeting dissolved any friction that may have existed between Congress and the Reform party, Abella said it was a good start.

Manning said the meeting enabled him to clear up any misperceptions Congress may have held about his party.

"Some of the public perceptions and ones that have been conveyed by some of our opponents are wrong. What I usually do in these circumstances is just say what our positions are and they usually seem different than what people have heard."

Rescued Jewish family sought

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Members of a Dutch non-Jewish family now in British Columbia are searching for the people they rescued in Holland during World War II.

Cornelia Colyn, 91, now lives in Port Alberni, B.C. Her daughter, Cori Aalhuizen, lives in Burnaby, a Vancouver suburb. Another daughter, Albertha Vos, still resides in Holland.

The Colyns hid Bart Roet in their home in Rynsburg until the end of World War II. Albertha Vos also smuggled 3-year-old Sarah Philipson to safety. Vos was 17 at the time.

The Colyns believe Bart, his brother Arie (who stayed with another family) and Philipson were able to get to Israel. They have asked the Vancouver Holocaust Centre Society for help in finding them.

"It would be so wonderful if after all these years my mother and sister could actually meet Sarah and Bart face to face," Aalhuizen told The CJN. "Who knows? I believe anything is possible."

Aalhuizen was 8 when the children were rescued.

The story of how residents of Rynsburg helped save Jews was first printed in a Dutch newspaper and is now in Yad Vashem's files. Fellow citizen Johannes Post was honored by Yad Vashem. He was caught, along with his two brothers. All three died in a Dutch prison.

Dr. Mordecai Paldiel of the Department for the Righteous at Yad Vashem is interested in learning more about the Colyns. "We have learned that your mother was instrumental in saving Jewish lives in Holland during the Second World War. . . We should like to have further details of your mother's wartime activities on behalf of Jewish persons," he wrote to Aalhuizen.

The Vancouver Holocaust Centre is hoping to honor Cornelia Colyn at the official opening of its Holocaust Education Centre on Nov. 7. Amsterdam mayor and former hidden child Ed van Thyn will open the centre.

Anybody with information about Bart Roet and Sarah Philipson should contact: Cori Aalhuizen, 7673 Newcombe St., Burnaby, B.C., V3N 3W1, or phone her at (604) 522-3651.

Canadian contingent to rabbinic forum

TORONTO — Twenty-one rabbis, from four continents — including eight rabbis from Canada — recently participated in the first Keren Hayesod Rabbinic Forum held in Jerusalem.

The purpose of the mission was to discuss ways of involving Keren Hayesod leadership in local community campaigns for Israel. (Keren Hayesod is the Israel-based fundraising arm of the Jewish Agency for Israel, serving Jewish communities throughout the Diaspora with the exception of the United States. In Canada, the Keren Hayesod works through local UJA/CJA/UIA offices.)

Julia Koschitzky of Toronto is the international chair of the World Board of Trustees of the Keren Hayesod.

Canada was represented at the forum by rabbis from the Orthodox, Conservative and Reform movements.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka, spiritual leader of Ottawa's Orthodox Congregation Machzikei Hadas and author of numerous books on contemporary Jewish issues, was elected president of the International Rabbinic Forum. "The greatest impact came upon hearing that the Jewish Agency has plans in place to bring 100,000 Jews a month to Israel should emergencies arise in the former Soviet Union," Rabbi Bulka stated. "The gathering culminated with a unanimous expression of resolve by all the rabbis to amalgamate their considerable recources to help Keren Hayesod/United Israel Appeal campaigns," he added.

Pledged support for Keren Hayesod

"Even though the majority of the rabbis on this mission were Othodox we all experienced a feeling of fellowship and unity," commented Rabbi Michael Stroh of Toronto's Temple Har Zion.

Other Canadian rabbis participating in the conference included: Rabbi Phillip Scheim and Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Toronto and Rabbi Howard Joseph, Rabbi Ira Grussgott, Rabbi Mark Friedman and Rabbi Meyer Kizelnik of Montreal.

Inequality still thriving in Canada, says Wilson

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — From the cloistered halls of the legal profession to aboriginal reserves that resemble the Third World, Canada still has a long way to go to eradicate inequality, a former Supreme Court Justice and human rights advocate stated last week.

Madame Justice Bertha Wilson, who retired from Canada's highest court in January 1991 after nine years of service, said a Canadian Bar Association (CBA) task force she headed found "systemic" discrimination in the legal profession. "It was built into the very structures and institutions."

Intentional discrimination was also seen. The task force on women in the legal profession found a "male backlash at feminism," in which "feminism" was used as a pejorative term, she said.

Wilson was the keynote speaker at the recent 19th annual human rights awards dinner of the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada. She was recipient of a special award for "outstanding lifetime commitment and achievement in the protection and promotion of human rights."

The awards dinner coincided with the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination.

In an eloquent and succinct address, Wilson said she was "saddened at the barriers erected against able, dedicated women whose only disqualification was nothing other than their sex."

Turning to her participation in the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, she said she found "untold misery and appalling living conditions" in communities from coast to coast.

"Canada's first people live in Third World conditions in a first world country. This is condoned by indifference and inaction," she said. "At the root of our indifference is racism which leads us to view others as inferior and unworthy of our concern. We have deprived these people of their self-respect, pride, history, culture and traditions."

Bertha Wilson

Despite that, aboriginals have miraculously survived as a people, in large part out of a conviction that they had been put here by the creator to care for the earth.

Aboriginal people want self government to help them break loose from the dominant society whose values they do not share and to help them recapture their own identity as a proud people, she stated.

The media, she continued, have an "awesome responsibility" to promote sensitivity and human rights. They played a large role in influencing the CBA to change its position and agree to conduct a study of prejudice in its ranks, she said.

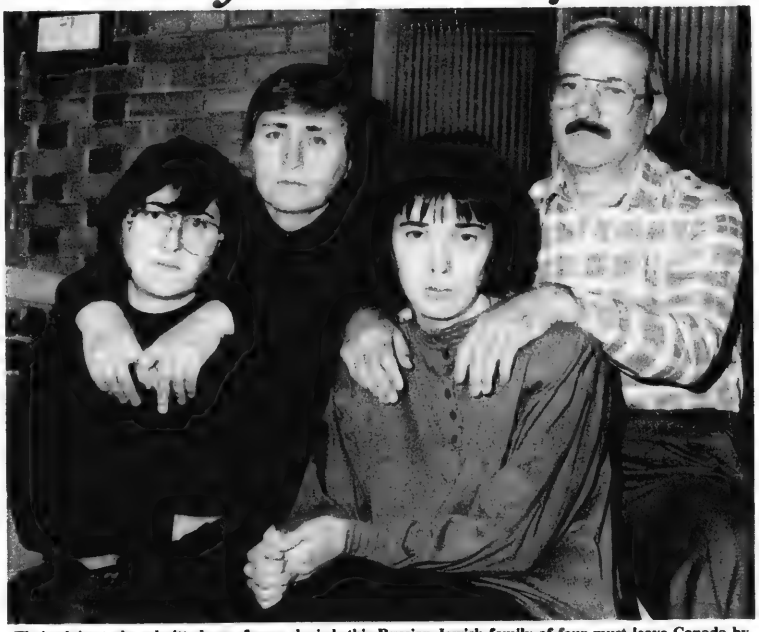
Earlier in the program, awards were presented in print, television, radio and advertising categories for work that addresses the issues of racism and discrimination.

The Kitchener-Waterloo Record captured top honors in the print category for articles on racism in schools. The CBC Evening News of Toronto won in the television medium for a series that investigated the far-right movement in Canada, while CBC Radio News earned an award for its program titled, Refugee Women.

Winners in the advertising category were PNMD/Publitel, Secretariat a la famille and Cineland, for a joint production that dealt with the importance of children.

Ontario lieutenant-governor Henry Jackman served as honorary patron of the awards dinner, which was attended by 350 community leaders and government representatives, including Ontario premier Bob Rae.

Russian Jewish family ordered to leave by May 26



Their claim to be admitted as refugees denied, this Russian Jewish family of four must leave Canada by May 26, Felix Gogniev, his ex-wife Dina Tsallaeva, and their daughters, Zalina Roth (married to a Canadian), and Tima. They came to Canada on visitors' visas three years ago. The Immigration and Refugee Board ruled in 1991 that they would not necessarily face persecution if returned to North Ossetia.

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A three-year quest for a safe haven has ended in misery for a Russian Jewish family of four who must leave Canada by May 26.

After hearing the decison of the Immigration Department adjudicator, daughter Tima Gogniev, 27, told The CJN: "So Canada is completing what another country started, that's how I feel at the bottom of my heart."

Her father, Felix Gogniev, told the adjudicator: "This is a matter of life and death for us."

Those who must leave are Gogniev, 56, an economist, his ex-wife, Dina Tsallaeva, their daughter Tima, and another daughter Zalina Roth, 25, even though she is married to Gera Roth, a Canadian citizen.

The plight of the Gognievs, who live in North York, arises from the decision by an Immigration and Refugee Board that they do not necessarily face persecution as Jews if they are returned to their native land of North Ossetia, in the former Soviet Union on the border of Georgia, where tribal warfare is rife.

Ruling they must leave Canada because they have overstayed their visitors' visas, Adjudicator Sylvanna Gratton said she has no power to overturn the Board's ruling and is bound by the Immigration Act. She will resume the inquiry April 26 to hear evidence as to whether the Gognievs should be put on a departure order, under which they could reapply from outside Canada, or whether she should issue a deportation order under which they need the permission of the Minister of Immigration to reapply.

At the outset, Gratton said she would not step down from the case because of the apprehension of bias, as contended by the Gognievs' counsel, Christine Kurawata. Kurawata argued that the adjudicator had shown bias against welfare recipients. Gratton said no reasonable person would interpret her off-the-cuff remarks in that way.

The Board's decision against the Gognievs' being allowed refugee status reviewed the alleged history of persecution of Jews in North Ossetia and the evidence claiming that both Mr. and Mrs. Gogniev had been tortured, but said the Gognievs had not proven their Jewish faith, and even if they were Jews, there was no certainty they would face discrimination.

The Board members, H.R Hanson and W. Bauer, held the hearing June 12, 1991, and gave their negative decision Aug. 13, 1991. Neither of these men is still on the Board. The Gognievs have not been able to present any evidence of the worsening situation in North Ossetia to any official government agency since the Board's decision.

The Jewish Immigrant Aid Society has appealed on behalf of the Gognievs without success. An appeal to the Immigration Department by the Gognievs to have the Board's decision overturned on humanitarian and compassionate grounds was denied.

Gratton ruled that all four are subject to expulsion because they have overstayed their visitors' visas. In addition, the parents are ineligible to be admitted to Canada on the grounds that they are still receiving welfare.

At one point, after giving her verdict, the adjudicator asked Gogniev if he understood the decision. "No person in his right mind would understand it," Gogniev replied. He attended the inquiry on crutches following knee surgery in February. Both daughters cried when they heard the decision.

The Gognievs are still hoping that some administrative tribunal will listen to their pleas. They are hoping the report from a review by Amnnesty International will arrive in time to be considered at the resumed inquiry.

Vince Greco, representing the Immigration Department, suggested the Gognievs check to see if they would be admitted by Israel. In reply to a question by counsel Kurata, Gogniev said he was sure his Jewish origin makes them eligible.

At the inquiry, job offers to Gogniev and Zalina were tabled, while Tsallaeva and Tima testified they also had prospects of work, Tsallaeva as a highly-qualified nurse and Tima as a dentist. They have been unable to take jobs, because their expired visitors' visas denied them employment rights.

Gogniev testified that though he has accepted $20,000 in welfare payments since his arrival in Canada, he contributed $80,000 in voluntary unpaid work for the Ontario Ministry of the Environment.

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

GLICK

Veteran accountant Sol Glick has asked me to research his name, although I suspect he needs no help from me.

Glick (gluck in German) means luck and was enthusiastically adopted by people who hoped it would bring good fortune, happiness and success.

A variation is Gluckstern (lucky star).

MATTHAU

I read with interest an interview in this paper with the distinguished actor Walter Matthau. He attributed the origin of his name to a shtetl in Russia called Mataschansky. Even that is a slight change from Matyushanski, which refers to the Lithuanian village of Matyushi, which is near the great cutlural centre of Vilna (Wilno).

KWINTER

Kwinter is a familiar name to Ontarions. Monte is a member of the Ontario Legislative Assembly and served as a cabinet minister in the Liberal government of David Peterson.

The name is also well-known for its meat products.

Kwint is the Jewish word for a particle or speck. It was affectionately given to a person of diminutive stature. It represented a size shorter than Klein. In French, it would probably be "le petit gars."

Quebec City synagogue defaced with swastikas

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

QUEBEC CITY — This city's small Jewish community was shocked when its synagogue was recently painted with two swastikas and the word "whuns."

Joe Weiser, treasurer of Congregation Beth Israel Ohev Shalom, said the vandalism must have occurred overnight March 19-20. He discovered the defaced white door to the chapel on the Sunday morning. There was a large swastika on the door and a much smaller one on the plate with the congregation's name.

No other damage was found, although it appeared someone had tried to pry open the door with a knife, he said.

Jack Jedwab, community relations director of Canadian Jewish Congress, said "whuns" meant nothing to him, unless it was a misspelling of 'huns,' meaning vandals, sometimes used as an offensive term for Germans.

The Jewish cemetery in Ste. Foy was vandalized about three years ago, but Weiser said the congregation has not otherwise experienced any serious anti-Semitic incidents in recent memory. About 25 families belong to the congregation, the only synagogue in Quebec City.

The congregation has been in its present location for only about a year. It sold its synagogue on Cremazie Street a few years and rented space for a while before purchasing new premises, a house on Place de Merici, in a residential area.

Police asked for full investigation

Although the perpetrators were never found, Weiser thinks the attack on the cemetery was the work of drunken youths. He's not so sanguine about this incident.

He is worried that it may have been provoked by the Hebron mosque massacre or the film Schindler's List, which opened a few weeks ago in Quebec City. Police say they have no leads in this latest vandalism.

Jedwab said skinhead organizations exist in Quebec City, but it is too early to conclude who daubed the synagogue. He has asked the police to conduct a full investigation.

This incident is a chilling reminder to Weiser of 50 years ago when the night before the community centre on Cremazie was to be dedicated the place was firebombed and burned down.

"We are shocked and saddened that this could happen in a close community like ours," said Weiser, who is also B'nai Brith's spokesman in Quebec City.

The League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada chair Stephen Scheinberg condemned the incident and called for "determined governmental action to confront racism and hate crimes.

"This act of vandalism is an assault on the Jewish community and an affront to all [Quebecers]."

Jedwab said the incident was particularly unfortunate because of the "important historic presence" of a Jewish community in Quebec City and the efforts that have been made in recent years in "sensitization around the Holocaust."

Abella kicks off Congress' 75th anniversary celebrations

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A late winter snow blustered about the venerable Monument National Theatre last Wednesday evening.

Inside, however, the atmosphere was considerably more inviting.

Before about 200 invited guests, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) president Irving Abella kicked off the organization's 75th anniversary year with memories to warm the crowd and with a poignant affirmation of the "parliament of Canadian Jewry's" founding vision.

It is a vision, Abella noted on the same date (March 16) and at the same site as CJC's very first plenary assembly, that has adapted to the times but not veered from its fundamental commitment to be a unifying force for Canadian Jews.

The invited guests, who ranged from the rank and file to speaker Jean Dorion, president of the Societe St. Jean Baptiste (SSJB), toasted Congress with a little wine and much affection.

Abella, CJC's 13th president (Lyon Cohen was the first), noted its greatest strengths: "elasticity" and a "resolute and fiercely democratic spirit."

"There have been conflicting visions, but only one voice," said Abella, joined at the front of the theatre's Cafe des Artistes hall by former presidents Irwin Cotler (1980-83), Milton Harris ('83-'86), and Dorothy Reitman ('86-'89).

Congress, he said, "began as an organization for Canadian Jews.

"But it has become an organization of Canadian Jews."

Abella summoned up venerated names from the past, such as the late Saul Hayes and Sam Bronfman, who wielded control over Congress with a singlemindedness of purpose for 25 years.

But it was a past that Abella did not romanticize.

CJC's founding era may have been one of great dynamism and vitality for Canadian Jews, but, he added, it was also a period marked by "quotas, boycotts, and exclusionism" from the upper echelons of Canadian society.

This, thankfully, has changed. Canadian Jews, Abella said, now become chief justices (the late Bora Laskin) and principals of McGill University (Bernard Shapiro, this fall), where Jews were once subject to quotas.

Abella said Congress's founders "built better than they knew," instilling a sense of dignity, purpose, social activism and "Canadianism" within the nation's Jewry, as well as an abiding commitment to unity, Israel and human rights.

The two-hour reception at the Monument National was marked by a festive spirit as guests shared memories over wine and cheese and a CJC birthday cake, viewed an archival display, and took a tour of the freshly refurbished theatre, orginally built as a site for the SSJB.

Politicians attend event

Dorion, in fact, seemed to take advantage of the mood of rapprochement infecting the crowd and which has been so high on the Congress agenda in recent years.

Dorion drew a parallel between the struggle of French-Quebecers and Jews to preserve their respective identities.

He also said there has to be room in a pluralistic Quebec society to recognize the value of minorities establishing institutions (such as CJC) to "affirm their identitites."

Dorion also held out hope for the future, including, perhaps one day, a Jewish SSJB preident. "Why not?" he asked.

The guestlist feting CJC included Jewish and non-Jewish community leaders and prominent figures, present and erstwhile politicans, diplomats, and descendants of CJC's founders.

Politicans included MNA hopefuls Russell Copeman and Lawrence Bergman, former D'Arcy McGee MNA Herbert Marx and current MNA Robert Libman, Cote St. Luc Mayor Bernard Lang, former federal multiculturalism minister Gerry Weiner, former Outremont mayor Jerome Choquette, and Montreal city councillor Sam Boskey.

From the Franco-Quebecois community came such figures as Father Jacques Langlais and Richar LeHir, president of the Quebec Manufacturers Association.

Celebrants also included Israeli consul general Itzhak Levanon, Polish consul general Margorzata Dziedszydcka, Jon Eric Van der Bery, consul general for the Netherlands, Father John Walsh and Sativos Antypas, of the Hellenic Canadian Congress.

Among those from the Jewish community wishing Congress a mazel tov were Alan Gold, former Quebec Superior Court chief justice; Federation CJA's Harvey Wolfe, Diane Sasson, and Steven Drysdale; Elie Benchetrit, of the Communaute Sepharade du Quebec; Eugene Reisman; and Manuel Batshaw.

The guests also included Milton Harris' wife, Ethel, whose father, Joseph Brody, was a Toronto delegate to the first Congress assembly; Ghita Caiserman, daughter of CJC's first general secretary, H.M. Caiserman; and Jack Wolofsky, the grandson of Hirsh Wolofsky, founder of the Canadian Jewish Eagle.

Also highlighting the evening were remarks by Montreal cultural communities official Joseph Biello, conveying congratulations on behalf of Mayor Jean Dore, and by Solomon Studenberg, representing the Laurentian Bank, which, as the Montreal City and District Savings Bank, also sponsored the inaugural CJC assembly in 1919.

Event chair Goldie Hershon and CJC Quebec regional officer Maryse Ohayon also referred to some of the letters of congratulations the organization received as the 75th anniversary got underway.

They included messages from the CJC regions, Charles Bronfman, Quebec Cultural Communities Minister John Ciaccia and Greville Janner, president of the Commonwealth Jewish Council.

South African Jews eye future with mix of fear and faith

Less than 120,000 left in community

By SUZANNE BELLING
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JOHANNESBURG — South African Jews face the country's first democratic elections on April 27 with a mixture of fear and faith in the future.

The fears among the approximately 100,000 members of the South African Jewish community primarily relate to the widespread increase in criminal violence, particularly in Johannesburg, where over half the country's Jews live.

The Jewish community here has also reacted with sharp concern to recent politically related violence and, to a lesser extent, to the economic uncertainty facing the country.

Only a few years ago, the Jewish community here numbered 120,000, but many have since emigrated and settled in such countries as Canada, Israel, Australia, New Zealand and the United States. Were it not for the recent influx of several thousand Israelis, the community would be even smaller.

Jewish political and communal leaders interviewed acknowledge the fears but remain cautiously optimistic about the future.

"The Jewish community is currently 'holding its breath' to see if the historic election next month will produce a stable democracy," said South African Chief Rabbi Cyril Harris.

"Despite the violent African National Congress-Zulu conflict and the threat of white right-wing extremism, the two major parties — the ANC and the Nationalists — have negotiated an acceptable way" into the future, he said.

Rabbi Harris and spokespersons across the political and communal spectrum share the view that there is no such thing as a "Jewish vote" that will substantially affect the outcome of the elections.

But the president of the South African Jewish Board of Deputies, Gerald Leissner, said Jews are "likely to reflect the trends that would apply in the areas in which they live — urbanized communities which constitute the bulk of the Jewish community."

Leissner, who was the victim of an armed car hijacking outside his Johannesburg home a few weeks ago, mentioned crime as the primary issue facing voters.

"The issue that concerns almost all individuals is the level of crime, which is becoming almost endemic in many of the residential suburbs where the community lives. It is hoped that a new legitimate government will be more successful in enforcing law and order," he said.

Rabbi Harris and Leissner, as well as the chairman of the South African Zionist Federation, Abe Abrahamson, said the Jewish community will vote center to left-of-center — with the likelihood that many will support the ruling National Party.

They also indicated there will be strong support for the left-of-center Democratic Party, which has some 10 percent of the seats in the present Parliament, and limited Jewish support for Nelson Mandela's ANC.

The shared opinion of those interviewed is that the far-left Pan African Congress and the far-right Conservative Party will probably receive hardly any Jewish votes.

Abrahamson reported an increase in inquiries about making aliyah, much of which is largely due to the unsettled climate here.

Abrahamson, a cabinet minister in the former Rhodesia — now Zimbabwe — moved to South Africa for family and business reasons several years after Zimbabwe achieved independence in 1980.

The South African Zionist Federation is "putting a greater effort into aliyah work," he said, but he feels it is too soon to draw generalizations.

"We should not overreact. Jews have their own antennae, which are part of their historical experience and part of their genes," he said.

"We will have to get over the hurdle. There is a whole new world opening with the elections. There will be plenty of opportunity and plenty of problems, both for the individual and for the country as a whole. But where aren't there problems?" he said.

Ronnie Kasrils, former intelligence chief of the ANC's armed wing, Umkhonto weSizwe, and one of two Jews in the top 10 of the list of ANC national parliamentary candidates, said that "it is the black vote that will bring the ANC to power."

The ANC does have the support and empathy of quite a number of whites, he said, "but this does not translate into votes."

He attributes the nervousness of the white community to both fears and racism.

"Most whites in South Africa still have racial prejudices. They still have fears, although the situation has changed in practice," Kasrils said.

He believes that when whites have an opportunity to see the record of the ANC, they will become more open-minded.

But he expressed bitter disappointment with the Jewish community.

"Most Jews are right-wing and not very tolerant," Kasrils said. "They are not really moving with the times. I haven't seen a positive or welcoming response, except from a few and I can count them on the fingers of my two hands.

"The Jews here are totally self-involved and narrow and don't appreciate the aspirations of all the people of South Africa," he said.

Lester Fuchs, a member of Parliament whose Democratic Party has more Jews on its election lists than any other party, said he was well aware of the nervousness of South Africans as the elections approach. But he added that he found on the campaign trail a "prevailing enthusiasm among voters and in the Jewish community in particular.

"Jews can appreciate what freedom and liberation mean to people who have been deprived and discriminated against," said Fuchs.

He said he was perturbed by the ongoing violence and by the release of many prisoners following a widespread amnesty.

"Law and order, as we know it, have all but broken down. One of the contributing factors is that the National Party and the ANC have colluded to empty our jails. This includes murderers and common criminals," he said.

He voiced hope that the situation would improve drastically after the election and that the police under the new government would have the confidence and support of the general population.

Fuchs believes that despite current emigration trends, the Jewish community on the whole will opt to stay and contribute to making South Africa a peaceful and democratic country.

"The role of the Jewish community is very important in this regard. Jews can, as in the past, play a role out of all proportion to their numbers," he said.

"Jews make up three-tenths of 1 per cent of the general population of South Africa, yet the contribution they have made has been enormous — economically, in the arts, medicine, sport, culture and welfare," he said.

"This goes to show that it is not the size of a community or the size of a political party which counts, but rather its determination to make things succeed."

Issy Pinshaw, a member of Parliament representing the National Party said the Jewish community has an important stake in the outcome of current constitutional developments as well as in the impending election.

"As part of the broader community, the Jews here are going through a period of uncertainty with regard to the elections and the formation of a new government. They share the extreme concern about the prevailing violence and crime," he said.

He believes one of the major causes of the violence is political, "as there is a power struggle, especially within the black communities and between the two major predominantly black political parties — the ANC and Inkatha," which is led by Zulu Chief Mangosuthu Buthelezi.

He added that the situation will likely stabilize after the election.

"South Africa cannot afford continued violence, as it hampers business confidence and foreign investment, which are two essential elements in the socioeconomic development of the country," he said.

Pinshaw said Jews have a valuable role to play in building the new South Africa.

"In the past they have been pioneers in the political, social and economic development of this country," he said. "It is significant that they are represented in most of the major political parties contesting the elections."

Johannesburg Jews talk to the PLO

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JOHANNESBURG — Leaders of the Jewish community here have held their first-ever meeting with a representative of the PLO.

The meeting was held this week with the PLO ambassador to Zimbabwe, Ali Halimeh. Among the Jewish leaders in attendance were South Africa's Chief Rabbi Cyril Harris, leaders of the South African Jewish Board of Deputies and representatives of the South African Zionist Federation.

Informative meeting

The meeting was described by both sides as "informative and useful."

Mervyn Smith, national chairman of the South African Jewish Board of Deputies, said the meeting should be seen in the same light as similar contacts with PLO officials by Jewish leaders in Europe and the United States that have been made since the signing of the Israeli-Palestinian peace accord last September in Washington.

Halimeh is a brother-in-law of PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat.

No way to predict Hebron attack: Barak

The five man commission investigating the Hebron massacre is seen at the opening of the hearing in the Supreme Court of Jerusalem. Jerusalem Post Foreign Service and Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — There was no way to predict the Hebron massacre, Army Chief of General Staff Lt.-Gen. Ehud Barak last week told the Shamgar Commission investigating the incident.

"It was like a bolt from the blue," he said.

And the Army never had standing orders not to shoot at Jewish settlers, he added, contradicting earlier testimony.

But Barak criticized the soldiers on duty at the Cave of the Patriarchs the day of the massacre. Had standing orders been carried out, "this might have prevented or severely restricted the scope of the crime," he said.

"A massacre is a massacre is a massacre," he said, "and even the most stringent security cannot always foil a determined lunatic who is willing to die."

The hall in the Supreme Court was packed to overflowing with spectators as Barak testified. Numerous young people, as well as families with children on vacation, sat riveted to their seats.

Barak divided his hour-long statement into two sections: a description of the background of the IDF deployment in the Hebron region and the rationale behind the army's open-fire orders.

Occasionally banging on the table as he emphasized the moral dilemma soldiers face, Barak spoke of the rise in the number of incidents in the territories, particularly in the period since the self-rule accord was signed last autumn.

He described how soldiers are shunted from one incident to another, "day after day, night after night." In conditions such as these, "when they have sometimes had hardly more than two hours' sleep, they have to exercise judgment about whether or not to open fire."

The orders are approved by the military and civilian legal echelons, he said, but the soldier knows that he might have to face trial for his actions and he has to weigh all the factors on the spot.

Turning to the question of arming settlers, Barak said experience has shown that "it is reasonable to believe that a Palestinian who is armed is out to kill one of his brethren or a Jew. A settler needs his gun to defend himself."

But, he added, "it is absurd" to believe that soldiers could testify they had been ordered never to shoot Jews (as happened during last week's hearings). "They must have misinterpreted this at briefings," he said. "It is not common sense to believe that a soldier would hide while a settler shot innocent Palestinian children walking to school. The soldier has to stop such a crime by all rational means. Our aim is to prevent losses on both sides."

Barak said soldiers were allowed to shoot at an Israeli who was endangering anyone's life.

"In no case is there, nor can there be, an army order which says it is forbidden to shoot at a settler even if he is shooting at others or at you. The opposite is true."

Asked by Judge Ahmed Zu'abi, the sole Arab commission member, whether he accepted responsibility for everything in the army, Barak replied: "As chief of staff, I am generally responsible. This, however, does not diminish the responsibility of the local commander."

Zu'abi then asked, "If extremists on both sides want to stop the peace process, why give arms to known Jewish extremists?"

Barak said arming settlers was the only way to protect them, because the army alone could not do the job. However, he added, "As I said earlier, if the site had been properly guarded, perhaps we could have prevented the tragedy."

Barak denied, in response to another question from Zu'abi, that the IDF treats Jews and Arabs by different standards.

"When I compare our performance with what I saw in a French commando unit 30 years ago," Barak said, "and with all the pain I feel for both sides, I don't think we have to be too ashamed."

Hebron settlers called a security nightmare

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — While Israeli and Palestinian officials focused last week on the security situation in Hebron as part of their efforts to restart the peace talks, the subject dominated Israeli internal politics, as well.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, who has recently criticized the presence of Israeli settlers in Hebron as an impediment to the peace process, told a Labor Party caucus meeting last week that the settlers' presence there was a security nightmare.

Rabin told the caucus he was horrified at the thought that between 100,000 and 120,000 Palestinians in Hebron have been kept under a virtual non-stop curfew since the Feb. 25 massacre there in order to ensure the security of some 415 Jews who live in the town.

The idea of moving the Hebron settlers from four enclaves into one, or of removing them entirely from the West Bank town, has been much discussed since the attack by a Jewish settler.

"You will have more support from the Israeli public than the media would have you believe, should you decide to evacuate the Jewish settlers from Hebron," Knesset Member Yael Dayan told Rabin during the meeting.

But Rabin replied that it was security concerns, not public opinion polls, that would determine what the government decided to do about Hebron.

During the meeting, Rabin was asked whether he believed the PLO and its chairman, Yasser Arafat, could be trusted to carry out their commitments.

"We have no Palestinian partners other than the PLO and Arafat," Rabin replied.

Hebron was also the topic being discussed at the Knesset.

The Knesset had been called into session by special request of the opposition parties. It provided the stage for an impassioned rebuttal from Foreign Minister Shimon Peres against Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu's charge that the government had been guilty of "a blood libel" against the entire settlement movement in general and the Hebron settlers in particular.

Labor was using the Hebron massacre to slur an entire section of the Israeli nation, Netanyahu claimed.

Peres replied that the massacre had created a blood libel against the entire Jewish people.

Peres described the Hebron massacre as the most heinous act committed by a Jew in the entire history of the Jewish people, adding that it had brought "shame and disgrace" upon the State of Israel.

Meridor questions ban on extremists

Prefers taking all legal precautions

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A former Israeli justice minister says he's "not sure" the country's cabinet did the right thing earlier this month by banning the extremist Kach and Kahane Chai organizations.

Although he feels members of both groups are "awful people and what they say is awful," Dan Meridor wonders whether outlawing them and branding them terrorist organizations was the right thing to do.

Meridor, who served as Israel's justice minister and highly visible spokesman in the Likud cabinet of Yitzhak Shamir from 1988 to 1992, says a better approach would have been simply to allow police to clamp down on extreme rightist and fanatical groups.

"I'm not sure that banning them is very effective or the right thing to do. What should be done is to sit on them and take all legal precautions according to due process, such as [preventing] incitement to racism," Meridor told The CJN in an interview last week.

Dan Meridor

The former minister, now a Likud MK, was in Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal on behalf of the Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev. Meridor helped drum up support for the Canadian associates' effort to set up a program of deferred giving and to provide scholarships for Ethiopian immigrant students.

Meridor, 46, was blunt in his assessment of Kach and Kahane Chai: "I don't like them and they don't like me." As an MK and later justice minister, he was pivotal in drafting the laws that branded Kach as racist and later banned its founder, Rabbi Meir Kahane, from seeking re-election in 1988.

"I was high on their hate list," Meridor said. "I was very active against Kahane and I was threatened by them."

But he finds it "somewhat strange" that the evidence used by the current Labor government to ban Kach and Kahane Chai did not come to light until after last month's Hebron massacre by Kach follower Baruch Goldstein.

And he fears that outlawing the groups will simply push them underground.

Had he been in charge, he would have asked for "strong evidence" that the Jewish far right poses "a clear and present danger," to borrow an American term.

And Meridor also fears that by banning Kach and Kahane Chai, Israel has moved closer to banning ideas.

"We have to be very careful," he warned, "not to cross the line on banning ideas, even as abhorrent as these."

Asked his view on several recent Israeli policies, Meridor said it is not his habit to criticize the government while he's abroad, at least "not too harshly."

'I don't like them, and they don't like me ... I was threatened by them.'

He called the government of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin "the wrong but legitimate government of Israel. They are the democratically elected government and what they do binds all of us, even if they are mistaken."

For one thing, he feels it's wrong for the government to keep offering concessions to Yasser Arafat as a way of enticing the PLO leader back to negotiations.

"That only strengthens Arafat's hand," Meridor said.

Rabin, he said, "is in a catch" for promising peace. "The government is in a bind. All of Labor's eggs are in the peace process basket."

If Labor doesn't deliver peace with the Palestinians by 1996, Likud will be voted back in, he said. So what it comes down to is, "Who's more afraid of Likud?" — Rabin or Arafat?

"I'm afraid that's the major issue. Rabin is in a hurry because he fears Likud and Arafat also fears Likud."

One reason for that, he offered, is because Arafat knows Likud would renegotiate the self-rule accord signed in Washington last autumn.

Meridor said polls show a "majority" of Israelis still wants peace but at the same time, a majority also fears the results of peace.

Meridor also weighed in on the creation of a Palestinian police force in the territories, saying it's "not smart or justified" to think such a force would protect Jews. "If this is the case, we're in trouble."

The former minister had praise for Canada, whose Charter of Rights and Freedoms he used as the basis for two Israeli laws on human rights and freedom of profession.

Canada's charter will continue to be used as a model for Israel, he said.

Rabin asks the Pope to help get peace talks back on track

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

VATICAN CITY — Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin used his meeting earlier this month with Pope John Paul II to ask the pontiff to use the Vatican's influence with the PLO and the Arab states and get the Middle East peace process back on track.

Rabin's request during the March 17 Vatican visit marked a remarkable turnabout in relations between Jerusalem and the Holy See, which until January had no formal relations. Israel has long been wary of the Vatican's pro-Palestinian leanings.

Rabin told a news conference after the meeting that he had not asked the Pope to initiate any specific diplomatic moves. But he said he believed the Vatican "can have a moral influence on many countries and many people" and thus put pressure on the Arabs to resume the negotiations.

Rabin also said that Israel would consider in principle the withdrawal of troops from the Golan Heights if Israel's security was assured, and said his government was considering further measures against both Jewish and Arab extremists in the wake of the Hebron mosque massacre.

Rabin, en route back to Israel from Washington, met for half an hour with the Pope at the Vatican — a meeting Rabin had requested. It was the first such visit by an Israeli government head since the Vatican and Israel signed an agreement Dec. 30 that paved the way for full diplomatic relations.

"Rabin informed the Holy Father about his talks in Washington and explained everything that was said there," Vatican spokesman Joaquin Navarro Valls said after the meeting.

"But the main topic was to boost the role of the Holy See in the peace process in the present circumstances," he said.

No concrete initiatives were discussed, Navarro said.

"It has to be studied, but everything is open," he said. "Certainly the Holy See's relations with the Arab countries could help."

Rabin's meeting with the Pope coincided with a visit of the Vatican Foreign Minister, Monsignor Jean-Louis Tauran, to Tunisia and Libya, during which he met with senior PLO officials as well as local leaders.

Navarro said the timing of Tauran's trip was purely coincidental.

"I would not say that this is a new initiative of the Holy See, but the development of policy begun earlier. Tauran has traveled earlier in various Arab countries."

Invited to visit Israel

Navarro, who characterized Rabin's meeting with the Pope as "very cordial," said "the firm conviction was expressed by both parties about the necessity of doing whatever possible to further the peace process in the Middle East, in spite of the recent regrettable incidents and also the difficulty posed by those who in every way want to thwart it or make it fall."

He said Rabin "recognized and underlined the positive role that the Holy See is now playing in emphasizing the fundamental values of peace, justice and human rights, and the peaceful coexistence among peoples.

"In this sense, Mr. Rabin hoped that the Holy See's role in the peace process would have a greater relevance in the future," he said.

At the meeting, Rabin renewed Israel's invitation for the Pope to visit Israel. No specific dates were mentioned, but a Vatican spokesman said John Paul accepted the invitation "with the sincere hope that circumstances will permit him to make this desired visit."

N.Y. bombing linked to embassy attack

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BANGKOK — A suspect in last year's bombing of the World Trade Center in Manhattan is now being linked to an attempted bombing of the Israeli Embassy in Bangkok, Thailand.

The would-be suicide attack, which experts reportedly say could have caused damage over a half-mile radius, was averted March 11 when the driver of a bomb-filled truck ran into a motorcyclist.

The driver fled the scene of the traffic accident, which was less than a half-mile from the Israeli Embassy in the Thai capital.

Not until a week later was the close call discovered, when police found a ton of explosives hidden in a water tank on the back of the truck.

Also found in the water tank was the body of a Thai driver who had delivered the rented truck to the perpetrators.

According to The Nation, a local English-language daily in Bangkok, a high-ranking local police source identified one of the terrorists as "Ramzi Yousef, one of three terrorists who remain at large after allegedly carrying out the bomb attack on the World Trade Center on Feb. 26 last year."

Security had already been ordered increased around the Embassy and the Bangkok synagogue, in the wake of last month's massacre of Palestinians in Hebron.

The bomb found in the truck was made of ammonium nitrate fertilizer, diesel oil and C-4 explosives — a mixture similar to that used in the World Trade Center bombing.

Thai police found 25 sacks of ammonium nitrate on March 18 in an abandoned house, which the landlord said had been rented to a group of Arab men.

Police lifted fingerprints from the house, which they said would be useful in identifying the terrorists.

At least four people were involved in assembling the bomb, according to the police, who added it was likely that some Thais were involved since it would have been difficult for foreigners to obtain all the bomb's ingredients without local help.

Bangkok's Metropolitan Police commissioner, Chaisit Kanchanakit, said he met with Israeli Embassy officials last Monday and that they had agreed to send anti-terrorism experts to help in the investigation.

Members of an American anti-terrorist unit reportedly will also assist in the investigation.

Suspicion is currently focused on the Islamic Jihad and several other fundamentalist groups opposed to any regional peace initiatives with Israel.

In 1992, members of a fundamentalist group detonated a bomb in front of the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires. Twenty people were killed instantly and 240 were wounded in the incident.

The explosives used in that attack were of the same type found in the truck in Bangkok, according to local news reports.

No retrial for Finta

Amerasinghe said the High Court also permitted the inclusion of hearsay evidence — in the Finta case, statements made in 1947 by survivors that suggested other gendarmerie officers were in charge of the Szeged confinement area.

But the court was silent on permitting similar hearsay evidence that favored the Crown case, he said.

Matas said the outcome of the Finta case is particularly disappointing since it was "as good a case as you could hope to get. There were lots of documents, witnesses; no defence was called and Finta had lost two libel cases [One was brought by the CHRA.] Finta was a test case," both with regard to the law and on the question of whether a certain set of facts could be proved.

Amerasinghe agreed. "It was a pretty strong case. . . The decision doesn't make prosecutions easier."

Congress, while applauding the decision upholding the validity of the law, urged federal prosecutors to consider other legal avenues. "If there is no evidence for a criminal prosecution, [the unit should] go for denaturalization," said Congress president Irving Abella.

"The decision has demonstrated how difficult it is to resort to the criminal trial option, which must now be abandoned in most cases in favor of denaturalization and deportation," said Marvin Kurz, a spokesperson for B'nai Brith.

He suggested such proceedings be instituted against Finta immediately.

'Denaturalization route would be preferable,' says Silverstone

"Based on three failed criminal cases (Finta, Michael Pawlawski and Stephen Reistetter) and one success in denaturalization and deportation (Jacob Luitjens), it would seem that the denaturalization route would be preferable, based on precedents," Silverstone said.

Abella said a Congress delegation is scheduled to meet with Justice Minister Allan Rock in the near future and they will urge him "to pick up the pace and to try denaturalization and deportation procedures and to let the Canadian people know what they are planning to do."

Pollard supporters angry

"We're going to continue this campaign," Pollard's father, Morris Pollard, told JTA.

A request for parole, based mainly on the argument that Pollard has served enough time, may win wider support, according to some leaders in the United States.

In the meantime, some Pollard supporters, who believed they might have had one last chance to make their case to the White House, were percolating with anger last week.

"We had been assured that the president's decision would be considered carefully following the Justice Department's recommendation and that we would be permitted to meet directly with White House officials to discuss the matter," said Ted Boutros, one of Pollard's lawyers.

"We were denied that opportunity," he said.

While Clinton's decision caps months of waiting, for Zeitz, it has served only to intensify the campaign for Pollard.

"It has made me angrier and has given us a political edge. We'll have to work that much harder, be more active, more vocal. We'll pull out all the stops.

"Jonathan and I both believe Hashem is involved. In my heart, I believe justice will be done."

The News in Brief

CIC Responds to UN Resolution

OTTAWA — In response to this month's United Nations Security Council resolution criticizing the Hebron massacre, Daniel Pekarsy, national chairman of the the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) last week reaffirmed his organization's long-standing conviction that Jerusalem is the "undivided, eternal capital" of Israel.

The preamble to UN Security Council resolution 904 referred to "territories occupied by Israel in June 1967, including Jerusalem."

American Jewish leaders denounced the wording of the preamble and issued a stinging rebuke to their own government for failing to veto the resolution.

According to Pekarsky, there is a consensus within the Canadian Jewish community for continuing Israeli sovereignty over a unified Jerusalem. "Any reference in the UN resolution to the contrary is both counter-productive and inconsistent with historical reality."

Despite "strong" objections to certain passages in the preamble, the CIC "endorses the resolution's reaffirmation of support for the peace process."

Dalai Lama Visits

JERUSALEM — The Dalai Lama, spiritual head and exiled ruler of Tibet's 6 million Buddhists, was in Israel this month as a guest of the Society for the Preservation of Nature in Israel, which hosted an international ecological conference in Eilat.

Israel refused to tender an official invitation to the Nobel Peace Prize laureate in order to avoid angering China, with which Jerusalem seeks to strengthen relations.

The Dalai Lama paid a visit to the Western Wall, where he was reportedly jeered by Orthodox Jews.

Strike Over, But...

JERUSALEM — A strike lasting more than 70 days has won Israel's university teachers raises of more than 70 per cent.

The salary increases will be paid out over several years, under the settlement reached last week.

Haifa's Technion planned to resume classes last Wednesday, but teaching at the other institutions of higher learning will only begin after Passover.

Students, rather than rejoicing, burned tires and scuffled with the police in Tel Aviv.

The angry students fear that when classes resume, they will have to pay the price for their enforced 73-day vacation, which cost them almost a full semester of studies.

They are asking for passing marks for the courses that were mostly not held.

They are also seeking financial compensation for the extra rent and lost summer jobs resulting from having to remain at their desks deep into the summer to compensate for lost time.

Education Minister Amnon Rubinstein has promised that the students will be consulted as the universities plan the best way of putting the strike's damage behind them.

Wallenberg Memorial Dedication

NEW YORK — The dedication of the Raoul Wallenberg Memorial Park, created in memory of the World War II Swedish hero, will be held in Budapest on July 3 under the auspices of the Emanuel Foundation for Hungarian Culture.

As part of the dedication, a 50-year memorial remembrance service commemorating the 600,000 Hungarian Jews who died in the Holocaust will take place at the Dohany Synagogue in Budapest.

The Emanuel Foundation for Hungarian Culture was founded in 1986 to memorialize Hungarian Jews killed in the Holocaust, to promote the revival of Jewish life in Hungary and to help the 80,000 Jews who remain in the country.

Editor's Sentencing Put Off

PRAGUE — Formal sentencing of the editor of the Czech anti-Semitic weekly Politika was postponed recently after the defendant's attorney alleged that the judge was biased against his client.

In January, a judge sentenced editor Josef Tomas to five years' probation. The judge also imposed a three-year ban on the publication of Politika.

Earlier this month, Tomas appealed the sentence and his lawyer filed a complaint alleging bias against the judge. The complaint will have to be heard by another court.

In December 1992, Tomas was forced to interrupt publication of Politika after he was criticized for publishing a "partial list of Jews and Jewish half-breeds in contemporary Czech culture."

No Funds in Birobidjan

NEW YORK — Although coal deposits lie within easy reach, the Jewish Autonomous Region of Birobidjan has no money to develop them, according to Tass, the Russian news agency.

There are an estimated 30 million tons of coal, which have already been prospected, in the area of Ushumunsk — enough to satisfy the region's needs for 30 years, Tass reported.

However, Tass said, the regional administration is out of funds to exploit the coal.

Money to develop the coal deposits had been expected from local commercial banks, none of which allocated the needed funds because profits would only be yielded in three to four years.

Birobidjan, established by the Soviets on March 28, 1928, as a Jewish region, is in the extreme east of Russia, just north of the border with China.

Voluntary School Prayer Promoted

WASHINGTON — Jewish groups fighting against excessive government involvement in U.S. public schools lost a battle in Congress last week with the passage of an amendment promoting voluntary school prayer.

The amendment, sponsored by Rep. Sam Johnson (R-Texas), would withhold federal funds from schools that prohibit voluntary prayer by students. It was passed by the House of Representatives by an overwhelming 345-64 margin.

Critics of the measure — including the American Jewish Committee, the American Jewish Congress and the Anti-Defamation League — claim it has little effect because schools have always allowed students to pray voluntarily.

They say the amendment only complicates matters by threatening administrators with the loss of crucial federal funds.

Latinos Get Israeli Envoy

LOS ANGELES — The Latino community in the United States, which has been growing steadily in demographic and political strength, now has its own Israeli envoy.

He is Avraham Setton, who recently visited southern Florida and Los Angeles to inform his new constituency about the Middle East peace process and to meet with Hispanic leaders and the Spanish-language media.

In part, said Setton, he hopes that the Latino community in the U.S. will serve as a bridge for Israel to the countries of Latin America.

But the community is of considerable importance in its own right, he added. Latinos, mainly from Mexico, Central America, Cuba and Puerto Rico, now make up nine per cent of the U.S. population, or roughly 22.5 million people. The percentage is expected to rise to 13 per cent by the beginning of the next century.

Security Guard Shot Dead

JERUSALEM — An immigrant security guard shot near the Damascus Gate to Jerusalem's Old City while walking to work died of his wounds last week.

Victor Lashtsover, a guard at the Income Tax Authority offices near Herod's Gate, was walking to work when a terrorist shot him in the head from close range, then stole his pistol.

No arrests had been made by last Friday.

Lashtsover, 45, immigrated three years ago from Russia with his wife and three children.

The Syrian-based Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine-General Command claimed responsibility for the attack in a call to the Associated Press in Jerusalem.

Vatican Envoy Meets Arafat

ROME — The Vatican's foreign minister, Monsignor Jean-Louis Tauran, held a "profitable" meeting with PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat during a trip to Tunisia and Libya last week that coincided with Pope John Paul II's meeting at the Vatican with Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin. (see story, p. 8)

The trip also led to the establishment of a commission on the problems and activities of the Roman Catholic Church in Libya.

Besides his meeting with Arafat in Tunis, Tauran met with the Tunisian president and, in Tripoli, with Libyan leader Muammar Gadhafi.

The trip "confirms the intention of the Vatican to tighten relations with the Arab world at a pace equal to its diplomatic recognition of Israel, and it emphasizes the growing role of the Vatican in the Middle East peace process," the Rome daily Il Messaggero said.

The Vatican and Israel signed an agreement Dec. 30 that is expected to lead to full diplomatic relations this year. The Vatican established diplomatic relations with Jordan on March 3.

The Vatican has no diplomatic links with Libya.

Front Line

West Bank settlers feel frustrated, alienated

By RABBI SHLOMO RISKIN

An Open Letter to Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin:

I compose these lines with tears, tears of sadness for my unfortunate Arab cousins, guiltless of wrong-doing, who were mercilessly slaughtered in Hebron, and tears of frustration for my Israeli brethren, staunch pioneers, who live in Judea, Samaria and Gaza, in astonishment and uncertainty.

I am a settler, one of the rabbis of Yehuda & Shomron. I am a proud citizen of the state of Israel, who made aliyah from the United States a little more than 10 years ago, and who was privileged to help found the city of Efrat in Gush Ezion, Judea. I try to be an observant Jew, one who lives G-d's Torah, believes in its values, and identifies with its festivals. But the Festival of Purim was transformed for me this year from a day of feasting and rejoicing to a day of fasting and mourning, from a day of joy and merriment to a day of weeping and sadness. Instead of participating in a Purim seudah with my family and students. I felt compelled to visit Wadi Nis, our closest Arab village neighbor, to express condolences, to strengthen friendship, and to admit my shame.

What has become of us? Our Jewish tradition includes the Book of Jonah, read in the synagogue every Yom Kippur during the most climactic moments of sanctity, wherein the Almighty teaches a reluctant prophet how much He cares about every human being, even our enemy Assyria, because they too are descendants of Adam, because they too are created in the divine image. The Jerusalem Talmud records that the 100 sounds of sighings and sobbings that emit from the shofar on Rosh Hashanah correspond to the hundred wailings of the mother of Sisera (Yasser Arafat before the Declaration of Principles at Oslo) while waiting-in-vain-for her son's return from the battle; this for the sake of imbuing our consciousness with the universal pain of a mother bereft of her beloved son. The Midrash records how the Holy One, blessed be He, quieted the angels in the midst of their song of praise at the time of the splitting of the Red Sea, with a rebuke: "My children (the Egyptians) are drowning in the sea, and you are reciting praises?" And Maimonides, probably the greatest religio-legal jurist in Jewish history and our most universally accepted decisor, established the law for every generation:

"Anyone who kills a human being (nefesh ben adam) transgresses the negative commandment 'thou shalt not murder' " (Midrash Torah, Laws of Murder and Saving Lives, Chapter 1, Law 1).

The city of Efrat in Gush Etzion. [Patricia Rucker photo]

With the tragic slaughter in Hebron on Purim day by a dedicated doctor gone mad, formerly accepted norms of conduct have been completely reversed. I remember a story which came out of the Shoah concerning a Nazi obersturmfuhrer who forced the rabbi and two judges of a small town to dig their own graves. The rabbi received permission to recite a final prayer before he was to be shot and he declared in Hebrew and German: "Blessed art thou, O Lord our G-d, King of the universe, who has not made me a Gentile." "But how can you say such a thing, schweinhundt?" thundered the Nazi. "It is only because you are not an Aryan that you are about to be killed."

Answered the rabbi: "It is now my fate to live in a period when the world is divided in half, between those who murder and those who are being murdered. Our Holy Torah commands: 'Thou shalt not murder;' I would prefer to be murdered rather than to be the murderer."

And now . . .

But Mr. Prime Minister, I am also deeply disappointed, and disappointed in you specifically. And since I respect you, and am grateful for everything you have done in the past for the state of Israel in general and for Efrat in particular, explaining the source of my disappointment may prove salutary. I settled Efrat with the approbation and encouragement of the government of Israel. I thought then, and I think now, that I am making a significant contribution to the state of Israel both by populating our historic homeland and by protecting Jerusalem. From the beginning we developed relations — social, business and even fraternal — with our Arab neighbors, including supplying them with water and medical facilities. Our inhabitants are heterogeneous in that they are new olim as well as Sabras, but in the main are all national — religious, dedicated to the state of Israel and the Israeli Defence Forces (with a high percentage of army officers), and committed to the ideals of Zionism without a trace of cynicism. In short, most residents of Gush-Dan would consider us "moderates."

Nevertheless, especially since the Declaration of Principles at Oslo, we feel frustrated, alienated and isolated — almost under siege. Suddenly we are no longer citizens but we have become mitnahlim (cry-babies, propellers) — and this despite the fact that we didn't leave our settlements during the intifada. Much the opposite; in Efrat our population has doubled, and then doubled once again, during the past six years.

The fact that there is a difference of opinion between you, Mr. Prime Minister, and a majority of the settlers concerning the peace process — that is certainly legitimate. But we are nevertheless in the front lines of fire; we are absorbing the majority of the sacrifice of terrorism (which stepped up considerably since the Oslo agreement); we are hearing from the army chief of staff that our security is likely to become more problematic after our soldiers are transferred from Gaza and Jericho; but from you, Mr. Prime Minister, we hear not a word.

Yasser Arafat loudly defines his red lines: the removal of settlements, Jerusalem as the capital city of a Palestinian state; but we have yet to hear the red lines of our prime minister. How long can you expect ordinary citizens to live and function in a nebulous atmosphere of uncertainty and danger, without hearing what their prime minister expects of them, without knowing what to expect for their future.

Mr. Prime Minister, I understood that you were insulted by the shameful slogans like "Rabin the traitor" which emanated from the Yesha demonstrations. I myself and many like me publicly denunciated such irresponsible language.

But as prime minister, you must rise above these petty issues. I want to believe that Baruch Goldstein acted out of insanity, and I truly believe that he represents a small lunatic fringe of the residents of Judea and Samaria. One of the tasks of the prime minister — perhaps the most important of his numerous and onerous burdens — is to bring to his side the majority of the populace, and especially that portion of the populace known to be most committed to Zionist ideals. He must unite, and not divide the nation; and along with his legitimate condemnation of the wanton murder of innocent Arabs, he must point out to the world at large that 33 innocent Israeli citizens were murdered by Arab terrorists since that fateful handshake on the White House lawn, to say nothing of the recent history of 14 Jews murdered on a bus outside of Jerusalem, 21 Jewish students massacred in Ma'alot, and 22 Jewish congregants gunned down in an Istanbul synagogue. And he must ask the agonizing question: where was the condemnation of the Arab leadership of such ongoing acts of terrorism? Can we ever hope for even a semblance of peace in the Middle East if our moral revulsion is not matched by similar expressions of remorse by the Arab populace and leadership.

I beseech you, Mr. Prime Minister, to work on behalf of the unity of the nation before it is too late. If counteractions to the Hebron tragedy continue to escalate, and we descend, G-d forbid to civil war, everyone shall have lost the struggle. Most of us yearn for peace, and believe that it is possible to maintain the values of religious Zionism and peace with our neighbors at the same time, despite the differences between us. We do not ask to be partners in your decision making; we need, however, to be told your objectives. Please help to heal, rather than exacerbate the breach in the nation. Only with honest communication and mutual understanding is there hope that we not only survive, but that we prevail.

Shimon Peres sets out his views on peace

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Shimon Peres, the foreign minister of Israel, played a crucial, behind-the-scenes role in the arduous negotiations which climaxed with the signing of a Declaration of Principles between Israel and the PLO on Sept. 13, 1993.

With the stroke of a pen, two bitter enemies forged a historic rapprochement which may yet lead to an overall settlement of the Arab-Israeli dispute, despite Baruch Goldstein's Feb. 25 murderous rampage.

That Peres, a former hardliner, was a party to such a potentially revolutionary accord would have been inconceivable just a few short years ago. In keeping with Labor party dogma, Peres had vehemently opposed talks with the PLO on the grounds that it was a terrorist organization.

But, as he writes in The New Middle East (Fitzhenry & Whiteside, $36), times change and, with them, policies. "We cannot allow the past to shape immutable concepts that negate our ability to build new roads."

In The New Middle East, which was published several months after Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's astonishing handshake with PLO chairman Yasser Arafat, Peres lays out his observations of the peace process, explains why Israel dropped its objections to negotiating with the PLO and warns of the dangers facing the Middle East.

With the 1991 Madrid peace conference as his starting point, Peres says it soon became evident that the PLO leadership in Tunis, rather than the Palestinian delegation from the territories, was (pulling) "the strings."

As he puts it succinctly: "... it turned out that those who determined the course of the talks did not participate in them, whereas those who participated in the talks had no say in the course of the negotiations."

So Israel, he writes, had no alternative but to turn to the PLO. "I knew that if we did not make direct contact with... Arafat, the negotiations would remain at a standstill."

And there was another factor to consider, he

Shimon Peres

notes. Hamas, the PLO's Islamic fundamentalist rival which rejects Israel's very existence, was hardly an alternative.

Lest he be accused of having broken an election campaign promise not to deal with the PLO, Peres says that the previous Likud government, if only inadvertently, launched the process that resulted in direct Israeli contact with the PLO.

Peres contends that Israel had no logical reason to delay talks with the PLO, given the mounting terrorism and the demographic disparties between Arabs and Jews which, he declares, would have invited the kind of ethnic conflict that destroyed Yugoslavia.

And in an aside, Peres maintains that Israel and the Palestinians could have saved themselves "six years of intifada and the loss of so much human life" had Yitzhak Shamir, the Likud prime minister, "not undermined the (peace) agreement I had worked out with King Hussein of Jordan" in 1987.

Peres has no doubts that the resolution of the Palestinian question is of paramount importance. "I believe that without progress in solving the Palestinian problem, we will not resolve the Arab-Israeli conflict."

However, Peres makes it crystal clear that Israel cannot, and will not, accept the Palestinians' claim of the "right to return" to their former homes in what was Palestine. To do so would "wipe out the national character of the State of Israel, making the Jewish majority into a minority."

Not immodest, Peres takes credit for coming up with the "Gaza First" idea, which jelled into the plan for interim Palestinian autonomy in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank town of Jericho.

It was never in Israel's national interest to occupy Gaza, Peres writes. "There was no historical sense in our policing Gaza, where every Israeli soldier who defended himself against a knife-wielding or rock-throwing Palestinian was blamed in the world press for violating human rights. It was a hopeless task and no good could come of it."

Besides, he adds, he was generally uncomfortable with the notion of Israel lording it over the Palestinians.

"By its very nature, the military government is oppressive... It is the very antithesis of the... democratic values set down in Israel's Declaration of Independence, in our basic laws, our political culture, and in our social-world view." Israel, he elaborates, "has no short-or long-term interest in ruling the Palestinians."

What emerges unambiguously from The New Middle East is that warfare is anathema to Peres. "Instead of investing in building and developing the region, the arms race, military buildups (and) wars... bleed the region of its main resources."

In Peres' view, economic development is of the utmost importance if tensions in the area are to be defused. With it, Islamic fundamentalism can be checked.

Fundamentalism, Peres states, threatens the stability of the social order in Arab countries. He maintains that fundamentalism is derived neither from the Arab-Israeli imbroglio nor from the ongoing peace process — but from an inherent resistance to modernism.

In this respect, Peres is only partially correct. Fierce opposition to Israel is surely an inalterable raison d'etre of the Islamic movement.

Peres fingers the Islamic regime in Iran for fanning the flames of fundamentalism. And he warns that the Middle East could be thrown into turmoil were Iran to acquire nuclear weapons.

Indeed, Peres is of the opinion that the "nuclear threat" is the central issue of the Arab-Israeli dispute today.

Like many thinkers, Peres believes that the concept of "strategic depth" has little meaning in this age of ground-to-ground missiles and nuclear capability. Which explains, to some degree, why he favors territorial compromise in the search for a comprehensive Middle East peace agreement.

In common with the late Anwar al-Sadat of Egypt, Peres argues that peace is conditional on breaking "the psychological barrier" between Israelis and Arabs.

"The two sides must learn to see each other as people — to understand each other's desires and doubts, hopes and fears. This is not an easy task, but it is essential for harmony and security."

Rightly so, Peres does not underestimate the importance of water in the region. Water shortages, he points out, exacerbate existing problems. He suggests that a co-operative regional body would do much to ensure more equitable planning and allocation of scarce resources.

Not surprisingly, Peres is a booster of tourism. "Peace and tourism go hand-in-hand," he muses. But in order to develop the tourist industry, the Middle East needs calm and tranquility, or peace.

And in The New Middle East, peace is the mantra that he promotes tirelessly.

Muted victory

The current trial of Paul Touvier can probably best be described as a muted victory over the ghost of fascism.

Touvier is the first French citizen to be tried for crimes against humanity committed during the Holocaust, and therefore, the proceedings in Versailles are of historic significance. The former head of intelligence for the pro-Nazi French police, the Milice, in the collaborationist Vichy regime, he is accused of ordering the deaths of seven Jews in 1944.

After World War II, the French government branded Touvier a war criminal and incarcerated him. Somehow, Touvier escaped, and was sheltered by reactionary priests of the Roman Catholic Church. In 1972, President Georges Pompidou inexplicably pardoned Touvier. Shortly afterward, Jewish and veteran groups accused him of crimes against humanity, an act not covered by his pardon. Once again, Touvier disappeared, only to be found, and then arrested, in 1989.

It is only fitting that time has finally caught up with Touvier, who is 78 and suffering from prostate cancer. He may yet spend the rest of his days in prison, which would not be an unjust outcome of his trial. Yet, as observers have pointed out, Touvier was but a minor cog in Vichy France — a "miserable secondary figure," to quote prominent historian Henri Amouroux.

By contrast, such influential Vichy France figures as Maurice Papon, Jean Leguay and Rene Bousquet have not even faced a judge and jury. Papon, 83, was the secretary-general of the regional prefecture in Bordeaux, and carried out deportations of Jews. In the wake of the German occupation, he was indicted for crimes against humanity, yet was rehabilitated. In the 1970s, incredibly enough, he was a cabinet minister. Thanks to cynical legal manoeuvres, Papon has avoided a trial, and it appears that he will never be brought to justice.

Leguay, who was indicted for the first mass roundup of Jews in 1942, died of natural causes five years ago. Bousquet, Vichy's chief police official from 1942 to 1944, was charged with the deportation of 2,000 Jewish children. He was assasinated in 1993.

Ideally, justice would have been served even better had Papon, Bousquet and Leguay answered for their crimes. But since this is not to be, Touvier has been designated as the convenient lightning rod of retribution for a dark chapter in French history. Nevertheless, his trial may implicate others whose hands are anything but clean.

Controlling archives

In July the American State Department will officially turn over control of the Berlin Document Centre (BDC) to authorities in Bonn.

Gerald Posner, writing in the New Yorker (March 14), indicates that the BDC is the most complete archival record of the Nazi party from its beginning to 1945.

Among the curiosae found in the Centre is the dossier on Amon Goth, the brutal SS commandant from Plaszow whose demonic character was caught in Steven Spielberg's Schindler's List. (Schindler's file is also in the BDC.)

Since 1945, when the Americans found this valuable record of Nazi infamy, the American government has retained control of the documents and access to them. Materials from the BDC have regularly been used by scholars, historians and justice officials for research or legal purposes.

In October 1993, the U.S. State Department agreed, after years of prompting by German government officials, to transfer control of and access to the BDC to Bonn.

Posner's reference to this agreement is the first public notice that this transfer has been agreed to. No discussion regarding this momentous decision occurred in the American Congress or in any other legislative body — including that of Israel.

German and American authorities have tried to assuage anxieties by pointing out that microfilming of each of the 75 million pages is now taking place and that the microfilms will be available to scholars in the United States.

Critics have noted, however, that the time lapse between the transfer of the archives to German authorities and the availability of microfilm could take several years. Moreover, microfilms cannot reproduce color-coded German documents and faded carbon copies.

German law, moreover, is much more protective of personal and family rights, and this protection has already had an impact on researchers who have applied to examine documents from the Nazi period and who have been refused that permission.

Germany's desire to close the books on the Nazi period will be facilitated when the BDC comes under their control completely. As Simon Wiesenthal has said: "The document centre is very important — those papers simply don't allow people to lie in later years. Those documents are holy matter."

JEWS IN WEST BANK

I take issue with the letter by Mel Shipman, chair, Canadian Friends of Peace Now, saying that Israel must choose between settlements and peace. In supporting such a point of view, Mr. Shipman is consistent with the attitude and posture of Arab governments since the creation of the State of Israel, namely the uprooting of Jews and their expulsion for the basic reason that they were Jews.

The suggestion is blatant racism and suggests that Jews have no right to live anywhere but in Israel. I expect that Mr. Shipman would be outraged and rightly so if Israel were to announce the expulsion of its Arab citizens.

When a Palestinian State is eventually established whether it be independent or in confederation with Jordan the Jewish settlers will have to make a decision about their citizenship but surely if we are told the new Palestinian entity will be democratic it should permit as citizens, Jews, Christians and others who freely elect to live there.

Once a Palestinian government commits itself to the protection of all citizens within its borders then there will be no need for the settlers to be armed and surrounded by barbed wire. To suggest a West Bank and Gaza without Jews would be tantamount to creating another Saudi Arabia where Judaism is forbidden and Jews are not even permitted to visit. Hopefully, that is not what Mr. Shipman and his colleagues propose and what the peace talks are all about.

RIGHTS OF HEBRON JEWS

Settlements or peace. So says Mel Shipman, the chair of Canadian Friends of Peace Now. I am no chair, nor a president, but ardently want peace NOW. The question is HOW?

Young people like Mr. Shipman and his supporters don't know history. I well recall 1938 when I saw the late unlamented Right Honorable Neville Chamberlain hold up a signed paper announcing PEACE NOW. After all, he had made a deal and had the signature of the legally elected chancellor of a great nation.

The prime minister of Israel has the signature (or was it just the word?) of the "president" of Palestine, the chairman of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO).

My reading of history taught me that Palestine was a country of about 45,000 square miles and ceased to exist in 1948 when its 14th and last conqueror, the British Empire, ended the Mandate it had held from the League of Nations. The United Nations created succesor states: Israel on a sliver, and Transjordan, which Britain had established illegally in 1922 contrary to the League Mandate, on about 35,000 square miles.

So how could there be a "president" of a non-existing country? Yet his letterhead shows the Palestine of 1922, before Britain carved it up into the new Mandate and the new land, Transjordan. Of course, everyone knows about the murderous terrorism of the chairman and members and supporters of the PLO.

Because a so-called "religious" Jew is so mentally deranged over slaughter of Jews by our new friends, the PLO, that he murders in cold blood Muslim worshippers at prayer is no reason for all Jews to feel guilty. We abhor such killings just as we do the murder of anyone, including the killings of Jews by Arabs.

There is no reason for Jews to feel guilty about living in Hebron or these so-called "settlements." Jews lived in Hebron and owned it legally 2,000 years ago and it was Israel's first capital before the Arab nation existed. If Jews cannot have the right to live in their own ancient land, what right have Jews to live in Canada or United States or anywhere else in the world? Because of hatred, must Jews be forced off land the Bible records was legally purchased by earlier Jews, and there are no records of it having been sold to Arabs.

It is time Arabs gave up hate and if they insist on their right to live in Israel, let them end stone-throwing and murders and live in peace with all neighbors.

PROSTATE AND BREAST CANCER

Re: PSA and mammograms.

These issues were capably discussed by Erica Meyer Rauzin in her column (Feb. 17), and by Dr. David Saul in his comments (March 3).

By now, most authorities agree that routine mammography can be life-saving. In my practice, I was delighted to note that 1993 was a good year. No patients experienced metastic breast cancer, because their early cancers were diagnosed and removed in 1988-1992.

PSA (prostatic specific antigen) blood testing for men, as a screening test for prostatic cancer, is more controversial.

It should, as a rule, be ordered by the patient's family physician, during the annual health exam, at the time of rectal and prostate examination. This applies to men aged 40 to 70.

A positive PSA can mean other things besides cancer. If above a certain number, it leads to X-rays and consultation, as well as confused advice about treatment. One 70-year-old cancer patient saw three prominent urologists. Each advocated a different treatment: do nothing (watchful waiting); have radiation; or have a major operation - total removal of the prostate. As happens frequently in family practice, he came to me to "break the tie." We agreed on the first option. For advanced cancer, chemical castration by drugs, or castration by surgery, is indicated.

PSA is meaningless by itself. Your at-risk male readers must have a digital prostate exam yearly. This is how most prostate cancers are discovered.

Late stage prostate and breast cancer have many similar characteristics, so preventive medicine is crucial. Disasters are avoidable in these cancers.

ETHNIC CLEANSING

Peace Now has finally come out of the closet. Mel Shipman (The CJN March 10) advocates Ethnic Cleansing or Transfer of Jews for the sake of "peace." I wonder if he would also evacuate Ramla and Lod (former Arab towns — now Jewish settlements) for the sake of "peace"?

Opinion

The fifth question at seder: when do we eat?

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

Whenever spring comes into view, Pesach comes on its heels and elicits in me a tremendous surge of hope. At the same time I start worrying when I compare the state of the world, and of the Jewish people in particular, with the euphoria which constitutes the aura of Pesach.

That is the way it has been this year, as it has been for so long. To be sure, Jews are freer today than they have been in a long time. Trouble spots like those we find in Syria are relatively few, and generally Jews are today able to follow the dictates of their religion.

But here my worry begins. With greater freedom comes also the freedom to forsake the faith — if not in name, then all too often in practice. Of course we would not want anything except total freedom, but there is little question that for a people like us, freedom has its price, and the price is the temptation to neglect our priceless heritage.

Pesach seems to reflect this problem. There was a time when Jewish women were engaged in turning the house upside down for Pesach; then the Pesach cleaning became spring cleaning; but even that is in a number of households I know postponed till summer.

Seder is still the outstanding family occasion, but how much religious content did your celebration have? In all too many homes it has become a glorified "family time" — like Thanksgiving in the United States, or Christmas for gentiles. We have no Santa Claus, though in some homes I know, the prophet Elijah will appear at the door in full desert uniform.

Rabbi Plaut

No question: Sedarim are wonderful occasions for getting families and friends together, but the problem is the same as with Friday nights. There too we have "family night" — but how much of it is Shabbat? Is there any sense of holiness, sacredness, specialness? And so with Pesach. Where is the real content of the evening beyond the meal and the gathering? Of course, the children still ask the four kashes (questions), but the more frequent question raised by all present is: When do we eat? Whoever conducts the seder is urged to make it short and faster. We rehearse the story of the Exodus and what happened in the centuries before without really identifying with it. That world seems so far away.

Sometimes I am afraid that even those who would never absent themselves for seder and perhaps have never missed one in their entire lives will still be quite unable to say what really is in the Haggadah. They may remember a few songs like Dayenu, or the story of the little kid sold by its owner for two zunim.

What else? Try it out on your family, now that the sedarim are past.

They should always be more than just reading from a book. The Haggadah is the hinge on which the festival turns, but its function is to open a door for discussion and contemplation. Why else would the sages have spent all night observing the holiday, so that their disciples had to remind them that time for morning prayer had come?

When was the last time that you talked about God's role in history? How do you picture God's incursion into our lives?

After all, the liberation from Egypt was more than being relieved of the yoke of the Pharaoh, it was a journey with a destination. Sinai spelled the meaning of the Exodus. Freedom without limitation becomes empty and meaningless; only when it is connected with obligation and purpose is it true liberty.

Enough of the sermon. Enjoy the rest of the week to the fullest.

Chag Somayach!

Rooting for the Rebbe

By YURI YANOVER

A close friend of mine, who was once editor of Yated Ne'eman, the major voice of Israel's ultra-Orthodox non-chassidic community, called this week to ask about the Lubavitcher Rebbe's medical condition. He has been calling to inquire about events behind the scene in Brooklyn's Crown Heights ever since news of the book I co-authored on those issues, Dancing and Crying, first leaked to the Israeli media.

My friend, mind you, had been hand-picked for his job by Rabbi Eliezer Shach, perhaps the most staunch adversary of the Lubavitch ideology and of its leader of more than four decades, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson.

Like so many callers this week, my friend wanted to know if the worst was near. I answered what I knew then: things were tough. The rebbe's 92-year-old arteries are progressively blocked. Despite the marked improvement in his medical treatment, as compared to the medical neglect and malpractice of 1992-93, there was no known way of preventing more strokes as long as the arteries remained as they were.

On the other hand, I reminded him, the press has been scheduling this man's funeral for some time now, and he is refusing to show up. I cautioned my friend not to buy tickets for that final event — just yet.

We then discussed the bizarre, if not awe-inspiring fact that the rebbe had sustained his stroke on the 27th of the Jewish month of Adar, the same date as his 1992 stroke. The idea that the rebbe's stroke happened precisely when the old moon was diminished from our night sky might generate some mystical contemplation, even by men and women who normally don't engage in the stuff.

Following that, my friend and I discussed the enormous blows the rebbe had sustained in the past two years (not counting his heart attack of late 1977): two strokes in the first week of March 1992; gall bladder surgery in June 1992; the criminal neglect of his rehabilitation, including the prevention of physiotherapy; several months of horrifying flare-ups of neurogenic pain; medical neglect that brought him to the brink of death on several occasions, most recently last November when receiving the wrong medication lowered his serum-sodium levels well below the critical red line; a series of seizures that caused him temporary losses of consciousness; and finally, last week's massive stroke.

We agreed that such harsh, relentless assaults on their bodies would have made younger men collapse long ago. But this man seems to absorb and contain each new attack, like a warrior of mythical proportions.

"I have no doubt now," said my friend finally, "he is the Mashiach."

I couldn't believe my ears. My friend comes from a long and prestigious line of Misnagdim, the Lithuanian enemies of the chassidic movement. His forefathers turned Lubavitch Chassidim into the czar's secret police. He himself was once part of the very instrument of war against Lubavitch inside the ultra-Orthodox neighborhoods of Bnei Brak and Jerusalem. His recognizing Schneerson as Mashiach was tantamount to Nixon recognizing Ho Chi Minh, Farrakhan recognizing Abe Foxman, the Oscars committee recognizing Steven Spielberg.

A great deal of that has been going around, at least among religious Jews. Slowly, perhaps even reluctantly, many of us are refreshing our notions of this seemingly indestructible Jewish leader. We're not clear what it is we're expecting him to do for us. We don't have a very mature and complex idea of what redemption and salvation might look and feel like. We're not even sure we could survive in a world where the wolf lies with the lamb and other such zoologically astonishing feats take place.

But we're beginning to root for the man Schneerson. All of a sudden, he is representing, albeit vaguely, the hopes of many of us for a better and more benign future. And we desperately want him to live.

Now is the time to think about Israeli MiAs

By RABBI AVI WEISS

From the struggle on behalf of Soviet Jewry, we know that progress is possible only when world attention is captured and succesfully focused on resolving the issues at hand.

But first a spark must be struck to ignite the world's conscience — a voice must be raised at the grassroots level.

And to that voice another must be added ... and another, until the call for justice cannot be ignored.

For prisoners of Zion in the former Soviet Union like Natan Scharansky, Yosef Mendelevich, and Silva Zalmanson, the grassroots cry for justice meant freedom.

And today, for the families of Tzvi Feldman, Yehuda Katz and Zachary Baumel, the three Israeli soldiers captured in 1982, and Ron Arad, the Air Force navigator shot down in 1986, the same voices united once again may be the last hope for their sons.

Because the rest of the world has turned its back.

The ordeal of Terry Anderson and the other Western hostages garnered constant media scrutiny. And major organizations throughout the world — from the United Nations to the American government — raised a hue and cry until their release was secured.

But forsaken were four Israeli heroes who remained behind. Forgotten was the agony their families continue to endure.

These Israeli MiAs are Jewish hostages. The enemy holds them as pawns to trade, to wheel and deal, to extract political concessions, not even telling their closest relatives whether they are alive or dead.

How then can justice be won for these hostages? And who shall lead the struggle to secure their freedom?

The UN? Despite the UN's avowed commitment to help resolve the case, it has done nothing.

Washington? Israel facilitated the release of American hostages by freeing hundreds of Islamic fundamentalists. America owes Israel. But to date the U.S. government has made no serious effort to turn up the diplomatic heat on the Israelis' captors.

Israel? The Jewish state is doing what it can, but can't do it alone.

Justice, it seems, like in the struggle for freedom for the Soviet prisoners of Zion depends on you . . . on me . . . and on individuals like us.

We must remember that four men who risked everything for Israel's security are captives who can only be freed through our efforts.

We must demand that Washington and the international community do all that is necessary to determine the whereabouts of the MiAs and secure their release.

The holiday of Passover is approaching. Passover means life ...Passover means liberty ... Passover means freedom, redemption, dignity ... the pursuit of justice.

During this Passover season we should all begin wearing blue ribbons and display large blue ribbons on the bulletin boards of synagogues, schools and community centres.

The blue ribbon will remind all who wear it ... and who see it ... that we will not be silent until these men are free.

And as we sit at our seder tables this year, we should consider setting aside a fourth matzo and reciting this prayer:

"This is the matzo of oppression inflicted on Israeli prisoners held hostage by Arab terrorist groups, Ron Arad, Tzvi Feldman, Yehuda Katz and Zachary Baumel. We hold them dear and shall strive with all of our might to lead them from slavery to freedom, from darkness to light. We pledge our utmost to bring them to the day of deliverance."

And when we declare, "Next year in Jerusalem," the assembled ought to pray that the Israeli MiAs, the Jewish hostages, will soon, safely, be brought home to Israel where their families wait for them with great longing and pain.

'Let them eat anything but cake'

By ERICA MEYER RAUZIN

As if preparing for Passover wasn't enough work, as if making seders for the multitudes didn't provide sufficient challenge, the holiday then delivers its final whammy: if, for a week, one cannot eat wheat, corn, rice, and all that, what exactly can one eat?

The work that goes into preparing the house for the holiday, into cooking seder, and into planning our celebrations leaves me too pooped to ponder additional culinary creativity. During the holiday week that follows the seders, I am not the only Jewish housewife in America who says, "let'em eat anything but cake."

This is no week to ask a Jewish woman to cook. Ingredients are limited, the big surge is over, the seder was a success and now we just want to nibble leftover chicken and forget about it until it's time to prepare the end-of-Passover meals and put the kitchen back to normal. This is fine for the grown-ups — my husband even likes matzah for breakfast, lunch and dinner — but the kids won't have it.

In the Pesach week homestretch, one cry echoes throughout the land, from household to household: "Mommy, there's nothing to eat!"

Needless to say, the response, "Have some matzah with charoset," is not satisfactory. You see, as the week of Passover unfolds, children go through a fast metamorphopsis from "I want to help make charoset" to "The charoset is great. Gimme more, please" to "Oh, okay, more charoset" to "Yuk, I don't like this stuff any more. I'm giving mine to the baby."

Erica Meyer Rauzin

This worked when the baby was two; now that the baby is four, it doesn't work any more. The baby is no help. He won't eat charoset. He'll paint with it, paste his hair to his head with it, and drop wads of it to the dog (who loves Passover because she gets ground meat all week but who does not eat fruits and nuts, ever, in any guise).

The baby eats cheerios or macaroni and cheese as a steady diet, snacks on rawhide puppy treats, crayons and, oddly enough, anchovies, but won't even give charoset a chance, at least not as a food. He's perfectly willing to regard it as a modeling compound, but that's another matter.

Meanwhile, the search for exactly what one can eat during Passover continues. I know I can bribe my daughters with tuna salad and persuasion. They are old enough to participate in the seder and they do understand, to an extent, that willingness to eat special foods and give up old favorites for a week is part of personalizing the experiences in the Exodus story. They are accustomed to the discipline of keeping kosher, so this isn't an entirely new concept.

I also hope they understand that once Passover is over, I will expect them to eat absolutely anything I put in front of them. No matter what, as long as it has starch in it. Imagine having just an initial few days or so when they're thrilled just to have a peanut butter sandwich or a bowl of popcorn.

I also know that when Passover ends, I will be left with voracious children, an empty kitchen, and an immense vat of charoset. Someone is going to have to eat it. The kids won't. The dog won't. I'm dieting, again, myself.

"Oh, Honey, I packed you a lunch."

Palestine the way it was

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

The winds of change swept over Palestine in the 19th century, and ultimately, this somnolent Ottoman outpost was torn from its medieval moorings. So writes Sherman Lieber in his fascinating, insightful book, Mystics and Missionaries: The Jews in Palestine, 1799-1840 (University of Utah Press, $45 U.S.)

Lieber's graceful narrative, supported by thorough research, is framed by two foreign invasions — Napoleon's in 1799 and Mehmet Ali's in 1831 — which marked the start of the modern era in Palestine.

Napoleon's brief incursion, the first meeting of East and West in the Holy Land since the Crusades, shattered its isolation, while the nine-year occupation by Mehmet Ali — the pasha of Egypt — introduced a kind of stability Palestine had not previously known.

Prior to these historic events, Palestine was a hopelessly backward domain of the Turkish Empire, with a population of about 275,000 which had hardly grown since the 16th century.

On the eve of Napoleon's sudden appearance, Palestine was a wild, lawless, largely rural society ruled by corrupt, capricious autocrats and intimidated by roaming brigands. Its economy was primitive, with pitifully few roads or public services. Such was the parlous state of affairs that there was not one certified doctor or hospital to care for the sick.

Apart from Muslims, Palestine was home to some 25,000 Christians and about 5,000 Jews, the majority of whom lived in Jerusalem, Hebron, Safed and Tiberias, away from the malarial coastal plain. Virtually all the Jews were of Sephardi origin.

Capricious autocrats ruled wild backwater

Jews and Christians were protected, albeit tolerated minorities (dhimmis). In exchange for various payments tendered to the Muslim authorities, they were free to worship and organize themselves in self-governing communities called millets. However, their lives were circumscribed by legal restrictions and social disabilities.

Dhimmis were forbidden to build new places of worship or repair existing ones. They could not ride horses or bear arms. They were banned from buying property. They were enjoined to wear distinctive clothing. On the streets of Jerusalem, Muslims mocked Jews and robbed them. A Jew buying from a Muslim dared not bargain for fear of being beaten. "What the Jew has to endure... is not to be told," reported the British vice-consul as late as 1839.

The Jewish Quarter in Jerusalem, 1818.

Mehmet Ali grafted law and order upon the body politic of Palestine and greatly liberalized the legal rights and social status of minorities. They continued to pay the poll tax symbolizing their inferior status, but arbitrary tributes and severe one-time taxes were abolished. Jews were granted free access to the Western Wall and allowed to repair their synagogues. In civil court cases, minorities were granted status equal to that of Muslims.

Lieber claims that the heretofore dormant Jewish population climbed precipitously during this period. Jewish immigrants came to study Torah, joining a colony of Polish chassidic Jews who had arrived in Safed in 1777. Some were lured by commercial opportunities. Above all, the reason for the newcomers' arrival was a wave of anti-Semitism which affected Jews from Central Europe and the Balkans to North Africa.

Little did they know what awaited them in Palestine. On Jan. 1, 1837, Safed and Tiberias were struck by massive earthquakes which killed thousands and destroyed homes and synagogues. By a cataclysmic stroke of nature the number of Jews in Palestine plummeted by 25 percent, dropping from 9,800 to 7,400. In one frightful moment, seven years of unprecedented population growth was abruptly erased.

As if to test the resolve of the Jews, the earthquakes were followed by a terrible drought, a cholera epidemic and a famine.

Shortly afterward, Sir Moses Montefiore, the British philanthropist, landed in Palestine to conduct a survey of the Jewish community. He discovered that the percentage of Ashkenazi Jews had risen significantly; that nearly all Jews were poor (most depended on overseas charity, or haluka); that half to three-quarters of the males engaged in religious occupations; that hardly any Jews farmed the land; that two-thirds of the Jewish population was under the age of 40; that the death rate among Jewish children under 10 was uncommonly high.

Sanitary conditions, of course, were deplorable. Sewage and garbage disposal was nonexistent. There was a shortage of clean drinking water. People were crowded into congested quarters, with little light, fresh air or ventillation. Not surprisingly, sicknesses and diseases were prevalent.

Before he left Palestine, Montefiore devised a plan to make Jews there economically independent. He was the first person to try to reshape Jews into a productive group able to earn their own livelihood. His proposals never bore fruit, but future settlers, especially Zionists from Eastern Europe, were influenced by his ideas.

Jews depended on overseas charity

Christian missionaries, notably from Britain, converged on Palestine throughout the 19th century. In Lieber's judgment, they failed miserably. Social pressure and community harassment dissuaded nearly all potential converts.

Mehmet Ali's progessive policies encouraged European pilgrims, explorers and travellers to visit Palestine. But travel was less than a pleasure in a country where distances were measured by days rather than hours. "A man, to enjoy travelling in the East, must have a frame of iron," commented a Jewish observer in 1856.

Nevertheless, foreigners were seized by a compulsion to see the Holy Land. Sensing a market, publishers cashed in, churning out upwards of 2,000 travel books between 1800 to 1879. Lieber says that these scribes, conjuring up a mythic world of "biblical nostalgia and fantasy," created "a Levantine mystique" which passed as truth.

Neither conversant in Arabic nor Hebrew, these writers neglected the "human geography" of Palestine. Their guides were riddled with errors and misleading information and informed by a cocksure feeling of superiority about their national tradition, European culture and Christian religion.

Many decades would elapse before the whole truth about Palestine and its people would emerge.

The Jewish World

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Nearly 50 years ago, a band of intrepid inmates in the Auschwitz-Birkenau concentration camp lashed out at their tormentors and struck a blow for liberty.

In October 1944, with the ovens of Auschwitz-Birkenau hungrily consuming their hapless victims, members of the underground set off separate explosions which damaged three crematoria and rendered one inoperable for several weeks.

The action, part of a pattern of resistance to Nazi tyranny throughout German-occupied Europe, forced the Germans to cut back the number of transports to this infamous death factory. As a result, many thousands of Jews were probably spared.

Indirectly, they owe their lives to Felix Opatowski, a retired Toronto businessman and member of the underground who smuggled the dynamite into the camp.

Opatowski, 69, downplays his role. "I was just a little pawn in their hands," he said, referring to the resourceful and courageous men and women who conceived, planned and carried out the strike.

While it is true that Opatowski was merely a courier, the operation would not have been possible without his assistance.

A native of Lodz, Poland, Opatowski arrived in Auschwitz-Birkenau in the winter of 1943. "I don't exactly remember the date. But it was cold. I was freezing." Before being taken there, he had been a street cleaner in the Lodz ghetto and a slave laborer in a work camp in Posen. Opatowski's parents, as well as his younger brother, Romek, perished in the Holocaust.

In Auschwitz-Birkenau, a major Nazi killing centre, Opatowski was one of the relatively fortunate ones. The kapo to whom he was assigned, a German Communist named Manfred, was not a blood-thirsty killer, nor a sexual predator.

Auschwitz mission

Under Manfred's supervision, Opatowski was put to work in the so-called neutral zone, the heavily-guarded area between the outer perimeter and the electrified fence. There, he and his fellow workers cleared away debris, snow and corpses (would-be escapees).

The work could be gruesome, but at least it enabled him to survive. He subsisted on two daily meals — bread and ersatz coffee in the morning and watery soup at night.

Opatowski, whose left arm is stamped with a telltale Nazi number (143425), joined the underground early in 1944, just around the time he was given a new job in the Buna camp in Monowitz, a short distance from Auschwitz-Birkenau. There, along with a construction crew, he helped build a German factory.

In Monowitz, Opatowski met Primo Levi, an Italian Jew who would become an internationally-recognized novelist after World War II. "He was an extraordinary human being. If someone was hungry, he would give away his soup."

Monowitz was also the meeting point where Opatowski regularly received packages of dynamite from a British prisoner-of-war who was supplied by the Polish underground. If Opatowski had been caught, the Nazis would have executed him without mercy.

Three months after Opatowski's dynamite shattered the crematoria, he and thousands of others were sent on a "death march" to the Slovakian city of Bratislava in sub-zero weather. He barely survived this brutal trek.

Before the war ended, Opatowksi experienced the horrors of the Mauthausen concentration camp in Austria, where he toiled in a rock quarry.

Liberated by the U.S. military on May 15, 1945, he subsequently found employment in an American army canteen. He and his wife, whom he met in Austria, immigrated to Canada in April 1949. In Toronto, Opatowski ran a pool hall and then a coin-operated laundry business.

In 1972, he revisited Auschwitz-Birkenau. The visit left him numb. Last July, he returned in the company of his wife, Miriam, and his daughter, Esther, with an Israel Bonds delegation.

He wants to go back in 1995, for a third and last time, on the 50th anniversary of Auschwitz-Birkenau's liberation. But, having submitted to prostate cancer surgery recently, he isn't sure whether he will make the trip again.

Jewish law and ecology

By DR. MEIR TAMARI
Jerusalem Post Feature Service

Any economic activity represents potential damage to the environmental welfare of others, involving the pollution of air and water, excessive noise or esthetic disfigurement.

If natural resources were unlimited, the polluting activities could simply be conducted far from human habitation. But since this is not possible, the ecological cost has to be considered. Furthermore, society has to determine who is to bear the cost of such damage in order to offset the economic benefits derived from the activity against the ecological loss.

Jewish law rules categorically that a person who causes damages to his neighbor's body, or property, has to pay for them; damage to the air, water, scenery or privacy is no different. Not only must the party causing ecological damage pay compensation, but a whole network of rabbinic legislation exists which is aimed at preventing such damage.

A mishna provides: "It is necessary to remove [from the town] permanent threshing floors [because of the harmful effect of the chaff], the carcasses [a form of refuse yard], the tanners [because of the stench] and the brick kilns [because of the smoke]." All the codifiers, Maimonides, Ya'acov ben Asher, Yoseph Caro, ruled in accordance with this and the further requirement that the industrial zones had to be so situated that the natural forces of water and wind would not be able to bring the resultant harmful effects to the town.

Modern authorities have ruled that in those cases where relocation or suitable zoning is not feasible, one is obligated to install all the necessary equipment to prevent the damage. Naturally the cost of relocation or damage prevention falls on the owner causing the damage.

It may well be that economic considerations make it more profitable to cause the damage and then pay the claims rather than to install scrubbers or other precautions, or to relocate the plant. Though the sufferers may be indifferent, morality cannot be, since over and above the financial aspect, there is immorality connected with using one's economic wealth to damage others. Not surprisingly, Maimonides rules that it is forbidden to cause damage even on the assumption that payment will be made later.

Despite the clear-cut responsibilities placed on the entrepreneur and on the rabbinic authorities to prevent ecological damage and to enforce compensation, there is no place for the nuisance factor whose purpose is to prevent economic activity on grounds of frivolous or petty charges of injury. Those acts which are part of normal business activity, even those which cause slight disturbance, have to be condoned, if only as part of a "live and let live" attitude.

In addition to the financial and moral prohibitions against causing ecological damage, we find special legal consideration provided. Foul smells or excessive noise caused by an industrial process do not require a 'hazakah' a proprietory right earned after a long period without objection by the injured party.

A clear demarcation is made in Jewish thought between development at the cost of discomfort or esthetic loss and that achieved at a cost to human health. In 16th-century Turkey, Rabbi Shlomo Cohen ruled that since the textile industry was essential to the livelihood of the town, it was incumbent on the neighbors to suffer the damage caused by dyeing vats — similar to smoke and odors.

Halacha would protect the right of a person to do on his own property that which is essential to his livelihood, provided it cannot be done elsewhere. A later authority, however, was quick to point out that the concession of Rabbi Cohen was only the result of the abnormal conditions of the Jewish exile which prevented them from forcing polluting industries to operate in special zones as provided for in the Mishna.

However, with regard to serious damage to the human body, there could be no compromise. Economic activity cannot be permitted to inflict physical injury on others or damage their health. In the same way, a person may not endanger his health or life in order to earn a livelihood. This may well mean that in an economy run on Jewish moral principles, certain industries would be unfeasible if it is technically impossible to prevent serious or permanent disability and disease. Examples which come to mind are coal-mining, asbestos production and perhaps certain types of nuclear-related plants.

Books

By BERNARD BASKIN

The Passover seder is the oldest continually celebrated ritual meal in the Western World. And the Haggadah has been reprinted more often and in more places than any other Jewish classic work. It has also been the most frequently illustrated work. Over 3,500 extant editions have been catalogued thus far, and unkown editions continually come to light. These editions vary in text, format, commentaries, translations, illustrations and typefaces.

Yosef Yerushalmi in his monumental work Haggadah and History indicates that there is hardly a city or town in the world "where a Hebrew press once functioned which has not produced at least one Haggadah. It has been translated into almost every language spoken by Jews throughout their global dispersion."

The first full rendering of what is basically our present Haggadah was included in the prayerbook edited by the Babylonian scholar — Rabbi Amram ben Sheshnah in the ninth century BCE. He introduced rabbinical midrash and commentary on the Haggadah, against the wishes of the Karaites who were active at the time and who opposed any interpretation of biblical passages.

Saadya, in the 10th century, and Maimonides in the 12th century, simply included the Haggadah as part of their larger collection of prayers. It was only in the 13th century that the Haggadah emerged as a separate book.

The origins of the printed Haggadah remain obscure. What is believed to be the first extant copy has been ascribed to the Hebrew press in Guadalajara, Spain in 1482. Other printed Haggadot soon followed in Italy and Turkey. But it was not until the 19th century that it became customary for every participant in the seder to hold his or her own copy.

The flood of Haggadot in the 20th century resulted in over 1,100 editions in the first six decades alone.

The recent upsurge of interest in illuminated Haggadot, stimulated by technical advancements in printing, has made possible the publication of splendid reproductions at reasonable prices. A rich harvest of magnificent editions is now available. One of the most beautiful among these is the Birds' Head Haggadah. It dates from about 1300 and is the oldest illuminated Haggadah so far known, at least as far as the Ashkenazi type is concerned. One of its most striking features is the large eagle-beaked faces imposed on human figures, presumably because endowing human bodies with birds' heads was one way in which medieval Jewish artists sought to circumvent the prohibition against the making of images. The males in the pictures wear — on their birds' heads — the conical "Jew's hat" introduced by the Lateran Council of 1215, and the female birds wear the hair nets and jewelled pins which were stylish at the time.

Another famous illuminated volume of medieval origin is the Prague Haggadah (1527), containing the earliest wood-cut illustrations. Still another is the Kaufmann Haggadah, reprinted from a manuscript located in the Hungarian Academy of Science in Budapest. Scholars date its manuscript back to mid-14th century Spain.

The best known of medieval facsimiles is the Sarajevo Haggadah, considered "the most famous of Hebrew illuminated manuscripts." Like its Hungarian counterpart, the Sarajevo Haggadah originated in the early part of the second half of the 14th century, probably in Spain. Remarkably, it only surfaced into the public domain in 1894, when it was sold to a Sarajevo museum by a Jewish child who had found it among his late father's possessions.

Modern Haggadot have been illustrated by a number of prominent artists, and special editions have also been produced by groups interested in feminism, leftist politics, zionism, ecumenism and gay rights. During and after World War II, the Israeli Kibbutzim produced many distinctive Haggadot, most of them extolling the virtues of working the soil.

The Haggadah is beloved, not only for its familiar contents, but also for the memories it evokes of happy family gatherings through the years.

Lubavitchers pray for the Rebbe

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Lubavitch Chassidim in Crown Heights revved up their Mitzvah tanks last week to celebrate their rebbe's 92nd birthday.

But instead of following their usual route across the city from the Brooklyn Bridge, this year the converted trailers were scheduled to embark from Beth Israel Medical Center in Manhattan, where Rabbi Menachem Schneerson lies in critical condition following the massive stroke he suffered on March 10.

Supporters of the rebbe were using his birthday, which falls on the 11th of Nissan according to the Hebrew calendar, to encourage what one Lubavitch leader called "introspection and action."

From varying points on the Lubavitch political spectrum, news conferences, media alerts and legislation herald the coming of the Messiah or, alternatively, the need to perform mitzvot, to help bring about the rebbe's recovery.

At a news conference at the hospital last week, Lubavitch spokesman Rabbi Yehudah Krinsky faced clusters of microphones and television cameras to set forth a birthday plea.

"Start with one act of kindness, to one other person, and soon these individual acts will multiply into a world truly transformed," he said.

This message was echoed in a full-page advertisement taken out by a Lubavitch organization in last Monday's New York Times, where — beneath a life-size portrait of the rebbe — readers were asked to give the ailing leader "the gift he really wants."

"Give charity, study Torah, say a prayer, think about your purpose in life, be a source of inspiration to others," the ad implored.

At the movement's Chabad outreach centers around the world, followers have been holding special services to pray for the rebbe's recovery.

In Washington, American Friends of Lubavitch hosted a reception on Capitol Hill and a dinner at a hotel on March 15 for a "U.S. Congressional Tribute to Education."

But even the birthday celebrations highlighted the split between those in the movement who have vociferously promoted Schneerson as the Messiah, and others closer to the rebbe himself, who emphasize the need for Jewish outreach and religious observance.

Rabbi Shmuel Butman, leader of the International Campaign to Bring the Messiah, gathered supporters outside Beth Israel last Tuesday to be at "the doorstep of the great revelation."

Others continued the silent prayer and devotion which has been going on since the rebbe's condition became critical.

But at Lubavitch outposts around the world, supporters say they know the rebbe's condition is extremely serious and that it will take an extraordinary measure to pull him through.

"Everyone is waiting for a miracle," said Donna Katz, who works at the Chabad Center in Pittsburgh. "We're ready for it."

PARTNERSHIP OF FAITH

Glass ceiling hinders Jewish women: study

By MARILYN SILVERSTEIN
Philidelphia Jewish Exponent

PHILADELPHIA — Remember that infamous glass ceiling that prevents women from reaching the highest positions in business and industry?

It also applies to Jewish women, according to a new report on the position of female Jewish communal professionals in Philadelphia.

The 30-page report, Status of Women in Jewish Organizations, commissioned by the Philadelphia chapter of the American Jewish Committee (AJC), was published recently.

Written by Nancy Isserman, coordinator of Temple University's Centre for American Jewish History, and Lisa Hostein, news editor of the Exponent, the study documents a dearth of women in top-level executive positions in the Jewish communal world.

Among its most striking findings:

— In Philadelphia, the fourth largest Jewish community in the nation, only one woman serves as executive director of a major Jewish communal agency.

— Only 11 other women are at the helm of their organizations: five serving as executive directors of synagogues, five heading up small agencies, and one associated with a women's organization.

— One notch below the top, many women are filling secondary and tertiary executive positions within the city's Jewish agencies and organizations.

In the view of Murray Friedman, mid-Atlantic regional director of AJC, the report shows that "there still appears to be a way to go before women take their place as full partners in Jewish communal life.

"We're attempting to strengthen Jewish life today," he said. "This report underlines one aspect of Jewish life that needs strengthening as well."

AJC has already presented the report to the top levels of Jewish professional and lay leadership at the Jewish Federation of Greater Philadelphia and its constituent and beneficiary agencies, Friedman said.

He said the goal is to sensitize them to the issue, to keep "the predominantly male leadership"aware of the concerns, and to begin a discussion of this within the Jewish community.

"This is not simply a study that will be shelved and forgotten," he predicted. "We've caught a current that is there."

One of those paying attention is Dr. Ernest Kahn, associate executive vice president of the Federation.

"How does the field deal with integrating women into its leadership?" Kahn asked during a recent interview. "I think Federation, like other Jewish organizations, needs to be alert to this issue."

The AJC report is significant, Kahn said, because it deals with a subject that has to be of continuing concern to Jewish communal leadership.

"We are now at a kind of take-off point," he said. "There are a lot of women who have moved to the second position in a lot of Jewish organizations. The critical question now becomes, as the older leadership retires, who will move into the number one professional spots?"

Initiated in the fall of 1992, Status of Women in Jewish Organizations reflects the results of a survey of the top three levels of executive — male and female — at 52 Jewish organizations in Philadelphia, as well as of 41 synagogue-based rabbis.

In all, there were 94 respondents, according to Isserman.

"This is one of the very few in-depth studies of professional executive women in the Jewish communal world," she said during a recent interview at AJC offices.

She was surprised the report dispels certain stereotypes about women in the workplace, Isserman said — such stereotypes as: Women get pregnant and leave their jobs; women won't move for their jobs; and women don't work as much as men.

On the contrary, she said, the study shows that women work the same hours as men. And only 16 per cent of the women in the study reported that they had taken maternity leave.

The survey also found that 50 per cent of the women respondents had moved for work-related reasons. Of those, 50 percent had moved to advance their careers. The top reason women turned down promotions was that they were not interested in the job.

Status of Women in Jewish Organizations recommends that Jewish agencies create a mentor system for women Jewish communal professionals, develop workshops for lay leaders on the role of women in executive positions, and encourage women's participation in national training programs that emphasize executive skills.

"The cadre of professionals is there," Isserman said. "The community needs to develop these resources — to use these women who are there — and not waste their potential.

"It's a situation that needs to be addressed and worked on...then I believe there's potential for change."

Minorities bringing different perspectives to Parliament

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The recent controversy over the House of Commons' morning prayer illustrates the "monumental" changes that have taken place in Canada, a forum at Canadian Jewish Congress' 28th regional plenary was told recently.

The prayer, which referred to Jesus, had not changed in more than 100 years, said Liberal MP Barry Campbell. It was altered so that it would not offend anyone and would include everyone. "The old prayer excluded me," while the new prayer "reflects the Canada of today," the Jewish parliamentarian said.

Forty per cent of Canadians today do not fit traditional definitions of who is a Canadian, said Joe Volpe, MP for Eglinton-Lawrence. Clearly, the previous definitions (which focused on those of French and English stock) were "wanting," he said.

With the immigration of other peoples, Canada is benefiting from the human resources immigrants bring with them, Volpe told the forum.

Furthermore, members of minority groups expect a "sense of comfort" from their MPs and a willingness to champion issues they feel passionately about, he said.

Even though members of Parliament may not be of the same background as their constituents, if they are doing their job properly they should understand the importance of certain issues to those groups and press for them.

Speaking on the topic Ethnicity and Politics, Volpe said that in years past, people played down their ethnic or religious background, but now minority group MPs are coming to grips with it politically.

MPs from minorities are able to inject a "new energy" and bring a different perspective to key issues confronting Canadians, he said. This sort of participation leads to both economic and social growth and a new dynamism in Canadian politics.

In his address, Campbell suggested it is appropriate to ask questions as Passover nears. He posed several, including whether he, a third generation Canadian Jew with an anglicized name, was "a Jewish MP or an MP who happens to be Jewish."

He also wondered whether the paucity of Jewish MPs and MPPs, as compared to the U.S. Congress, is a sign of apathy in the community or arises from the absence of encouragement for young people. And he asked, "As a community, what is your expectation of an MP who shares your heritage?"

Campbell said Jews and other minority MPs bring a unique perspective to issues that confront Canadians. Furthermore, MPs from minority groups can explain to their fellow MPs the importance certain issues have for their constituents. They also serve as role models to other minorities who may not yet be as deeply involved in politics.

A broad involvement in politics can "show our children they can do anything in this country," he said.

Three Jewish groups launch anti-racism initiatives

TORONTO — Three Jewish organizations are among the 84 community groups to receive 1993-94 provincial grants for anti-racism initiatives from the Ontario Ministry of Citizenship, it was announced recently.

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Ontario region, the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) Ontario, and the London Jewish Federation received $7,000, $15,000 and $18,000 respectively from the Anti-Racism Project Funding Program, which is managed by the Ontario Anti-Racism Secretariat of the Ministry of Citizenship.

"This funding will support those on the front lines in their work to eliminate racism," said Minister of Citizenship Elaine Ziemba. "The Ontario government is proud to be their partner in this endeavor." The grants totalled $1,117,800.

Ziemba made the announcement at an annual rally held at Nathan Philips Square to commemorate March 21, the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination. The rally was organized by the Anti-Racism Response Network of the Urban Alliance on Race Relations.

The CJC's grant was put towards their recent regional plenary, which included forums on Hate Groups in Ontario and Ethnicity and Politics.

BBC's project is an anti-racist symposium to be held this fall for the Human Rights Youth League, a program begun last June. The Youth League's mandate is to develop constructive, non-violent strategies to combat racism and anti-Semitism in Toronto.

The London Jewish Federation is working with local educators on programs about anti-Semitism and the Holocaust. They are also planning a youth workshop on stereotyping and responding to racism to be held in the near future.

The London Jewish Federation played a leading role in establishing Londoners to End Racism, a grass roots group that was formed last year to provide support, media monitoring and occasional programming about racism.

"Racism is the antithesis of everything Ontarians stand for," said Ziemba.

MPs discuss role of minorities

The third panel speaker, Liberal Sarkis Assadourian, MP for Don Valley North, said when he first came to Canada from his native Syria, he thought MP stood for military police. He said he and other Armenians appreciated the efforts of the Liberal Party to promote multiculturalism but soon got to thinking that if the ethnic vote helped elect MPs, "why not run myself?"

He said "an ethnic [political] base is the best base you can have," since most supporters are committed and will stand up for their representative.

As Canada's sole Armenian MP, he receives calls from as far as Montreal and St. Catharines from Armenians who feel he can represent their interests, he said.

Assadourian said that when he was campaigning, flyers were distributed in the riding urging electors to vote for someone else, since he would bring Armenian issues to the House.

"Why not?" he asked. "You have to be yourself. . . and in some cases, stand up and fight."

Campbell said the public often underestimates the impact a single MP can have in raising issues with caucus colleagues. And while some issues, such as bringing war criminals to justice, may appear to be of special concern to one group, they cut across ethnic lines and are of concern to all Canadians.

Jewish life thriving on smaller campuses

By AMY SATTIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Jewish student life is alive and well and living at smaller universities.

That was the message from four Jewish university leaders at a recent panel session on The Pressure Cooker on Campus: How Do I Fit In?, part of the 28th regional plenary of Canadian Jewish Congress held here last week.

"You shouldn't fear sending your children, grandchildren, friends or students to [smaller campuses like] the University of Waterloo. They'll be well taken care of," said Joanna Spinner, a first-year electrical engineering student at Waterloo and immediate past-president of the 60-strong Jewish Students' Association there.

Spinner, who estimated there are 200 Jewish students at Waterloo each term, spoke glowingly of the tolerance at Waterloo. Laughter rippled through the overflow crowd — national Congress president Irving Abella was seated in the hallway — as she described putting up a mezuzah in the dormitory room she shared with a born-again Christian of Filipino and East Indian descent.

Fellow panelists Tamara Howarth of Queen's University in Kingston, and Pamela Scheininger of the University of Toronto also described more of a melting pot than a pressure cooker.

Only Josh Ganon, the Israeli founder and president of the 40-member Jewish Students Society (JSS) at Lakehead University in Thunder Bay, said he was troubled by overt racism on his campus. He ripped down over 50 anti-Semitic pamphlets posted around Lakehead last month. He is concerned that the JSS, to which almost every Jewish student on campus belongs, will flounder once he graduates this year.

Howarth, a fourth-year political science student and co-president of Queen's Hillel, said she was concerned that orientation week activities had been scheduled during Rosh Hashanah this year, but went on to paint a healthy picture of Jewish life on campus.

She said 500 people turned out to hear Holocaust survivor Solomon Perel, whose story was told in the film Europa, Europa, and whose $3,000 speaking fee was paid for by money raised through Hillel bake sales. Another 150 joined in Israel Day activities.

Howarth said approximately 120 of the 400 Jewish students at Queen's belong to Hillel, and 40 regularly show up for Shabbat dinners and movie nights.

"Please encourage people to go to every university in Canada, not just the ones with big Jewish populations," she said.

With an estimated 3,000 students, the University of Toronto has one of the biggest Jewish student populations in the country. But Jewish Students' Union president Scheininger said her mailing list has only 400 names and 100 active members. She said it was important for parents to encourage students to maintain their Jewish identity while at university.

"Talk to them before they go away."

A lively question period followed in which many of the 22-member audience debated whose responsibility it was to foster Jewish pride amongst university students. Nisa Krongold-Schectman, a recent Queen's graduate, was one of the younger participants. She suggested community-subsidized trips to Israel may be one way to keep Jewish students affiliated.

"Many students seem to identify with Israel but not with Judiasm," she said.

The hour-long session also sparked talk of a joint Canadian Zionist Federation-United Israel Appeal Israel trip and a Congress-published handbook to Jewish student life across the country.

Political columnist sees secure future for Canada

Quebecers will reject sovereignty

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Canada will not break up in this century, even if the Parti Quebecois wins the next Quebec election; but if the PQ comes to power it will almost certainly mean a constitutional referendum, predicted Andrew Cohen, a political columnist for the Financial Post and author of a book on the Meech Lake Accord.

At the last referendum, Quebecers were asked to vote on sovereignty association, Cohen said at the 28th regional plenary of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, but this time the PQ will have to ask Quebecers if they are in favor of independence. "My sense is that, if that question is asked, it will be rejected by Quebecers."

Joining Cohen at the Lipa Green Building for the panel discussion on What the Future Holds for Canada were University of Toronto Professor Michael Bliss and Mary Jo Leddy, a recipient of the Ida Nudel Award for Human Rights known for her work with refugees. Rabbi Dow Marmur was the moderator.

Cohen said in the event of a referendum, Quebecers will be asked to consider their share of the national debt, the redrawing of national boundaries that might cause them to lose northern territory, the disposition of federal assets in Quebec, the renegotiation of international treaties and the claims of aboriginal people. "I think when faced with those questions Quebecers will realize that independence is a high price to pay so Jacques Parizeau (the leader of the Parti Quebecois) can address the United Nations from Quebec's seat in the General Assembly."

Cohen is not convinced the Parti Quebecois can win the election in Quebec later this year; polls currently indicate that the Liberals and the Parti Quebecois are running neck and neck. He pointed out that Daniel Johnson, premier of Quebec and leader of the provincial Liberals, is running on a platform that is unequivocally federalist.

If the Liberals do win, Cohen said, discussion of constitutional reforms will be buried for some time and the country can turn to other issues, including economic recovery, deficit reduction, immigration and the changing nature of our society, the future of our social system and the remaking of our foreign policy to accommodate life after the Cold War.

He does not see nationalists in Quebec disappearing altogether and believes there will always be a loud and articulate minority favoring separation.

Acknowledging that most predictions of the future turn out to be wrong, Michael Bliss said the world may be poised on the brink of what he called the Asian century, adding that in the next 30 years wealth creation in Asian countries may dwarf the industrial revolution. "North America will prosper mightily as we service the Asian boom. Canada, and especially Western Canada, because of our strong Pacific presence, is very well-situated to participate in the shift of the world economy towards an Asian focus."

He stressed that, based on the past, technological change will continue to enrich us and increase the opportunities we have in our personal lives. "The information superhighway is a kind of vague concept and it's clearly going to have more curves and more potholes than people are talking about. And undoubtedly, governments will try to overpolice it and in Canada slow traffic down to five miles an hour, but it is obviously the real thing. What the people are doing with silicon chips is going to change the way everything happens."

Mary Jo Leddy, who preferred to talk about the present, urged the Jewish community to take on moral leadership on the issue of racism. "Your community is very strong morally, you are established here in this country, you are the group that has such a vivid sense of pain and prejudice. You can give such leadership at a time when it is so sorely needed."

Leddy said she sees no end to the current recession, which is creating a climate where there is the potential for a great deal of racism.

She reported that refugees she meets know they are being made the scapegoats for a difficult economic situation and they often tell her of racially motivated incidents of violence. "Racism in our culture is not just some kind of spontaneous act of hatred. It's well entrenched in our systems. I think we're beginning to see some of the evidence of that in the Canadian military."

Vaughan ward boundaries opposed

Creates a 'Jewish ghetto,' Green charges

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — The Ontario Municipal Board (OMB) has approved boundary changes in the City of Vaughan, and Councillor Bernie Green says they have created a Jewish "ghetto" in the city's east end.

The population of the new southeastern ward created by the changes is between 80 and 85 per cent Jewish, Green says, adding that it will be thought of on city council as "the Jewish ward."

"I'm not happy. I'm quite upset," Green said of this month's OMB ruling, which created a ward for each of the five local councillors and attempted to evenly distribute the population among them.

Green, the sole Jewish member of Vaughan council, says the changes have gerrymandered his ward along ethnic lines and will make it "very difficult" for a Jewish candidate to seek election in any other district.

The changes are effective immediately and will be in place for this November's municipal elections, said city clerk John Leach.

The OMB ruling comes after years of protracted debate over boundary changes in Vaughan.

Under the old system, Ward 1 had one councillor and Wards 2 and 3 had two each, with the mayor and two regional councillors elected at large.

Green and Coun. Mario Racco will represent Ward 3 until the next election.

Under the new configuration, Wards 2 and 3 have been split into two smaller wards. The city's northernmost area is now Ward 1, the eastern part of Woodbridge is Ward 2 and the western area Ward 3; western Thornhill/Concord is the new Ward 4, while the eastern section is Ward 5.

A year ago, Green voiced opposition to splitting his ward, as did ratepayers in Thornhill and Concord. But when the rejigging looked certain, he reluctantly supported a council proposal that Ward 3 be split along Bathurst Street, believing that would still leave a sizeable Jewish population to the west.

The OMB ruling, however, has split Ward 3 along New Westminster Drive, meaning that thousands more Jewish residents will be in the new eastern ward than if the ward had been divided at Bathurst, Green contends.

The new Ward 5 is bounded by Clark Avenue, south along New Westminster to Steeles Avenue, north along Yonge Street to Highway 7, west to Bathurst and south to Clark. It has a population of 25,200.

Bernie Green

The ward encompasses almost all of Thornhill's Jewish residents, including those in Spring Farm, members of Chabad Lubavitch of Thornhill, and several Jewish day schools and synagogues, Green says.

"They've taken a multicultural ward and splintered off the Jews into one area," he told The CJN. "That could lead to feelings of isolation [among Jewish residents]. I don't think it's a good thing at all."

Green says it's "more than likely" he will run in the ward this November, and if re-elected, "I'd do my best to ensure the Jewish population won't feel isolated."

Vaughan's acting mayor, Michael Di Biase, told The CJN he's "very disappointed" by the changes.

"But I don't like to use the word ghetto," he added. "We're all Canadians."

Di Biase said he too supported splitting Ward 3 along Bathurst. He said New Westminster is not a major artery.

On the plus side, Di Biase said there is still a large Jewish population outside Ward 5, clustered mainly north of Clark and west of Bathurst, around the Promenade Shopping Centre.

Anti-racism day

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — The international anti-racism day was celebrated here March 21 with anti-racist and anti-fascist events throughout the province.

Anti-fascism film festivals, presented by the B.C. Organization to Fight Racism, of which Canadian Jewish Congress Pacific region is a member, were held in both Vancouver and Victoria.

In Victoria the newly-organized Capital Regional District Race Relations Council held a reception at city hall with the province's multicultural minister, Moe Sihota, as special guest. The Jewish Community Centre of Victoria is represented on the council.

"Our government is committed to improving human relations and eliminating racism through specific anti-racism initiatives, human rights legislation, employment equity, promotion of multiculturalism and support for community programs," said Sihota.

Jewish artists band together for Holocaust remembrance

Glick, Kowarsky prepare script

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — To honor the memory of those who perished in the Holocaust and to acknowledge the unspeakable tales of those who survived the Shoah, an illustrious list of artists will portray survival and moral resistance in an evening of remembrance.

On Thursday, April 7 at 7:30 p.m. at the Beth Tzedec Synagogue, 1700 Bathurst St. a Holocaust memorial program will be presented, entitled Cultural Reflections on the Holocaust: A Memorial in Music, Poetry and Art.

Paul Kowarsky

"Our journey through this world of darkness is illuminated by our appreciation of the 'struggle of those who morally and physically resisted annihilation and we, like them, pledge 'Zog nit kein mol a du geist dem letzin veg' [Never say that you are going on the last road]," says Srul Irving Glick, composer-in-residence of Beth Tikvah Synagogue, who along with Beth Tzedec's Cantor Paul Kowarsky, have compiled a special script for this program.

Srul Irving Glick

Glick, one of Canada's most prolific and acclaimed composers, has received numerous awards, especially for his vocal and choral music.

Kowarsky's tenor voice and interpretations of traditional cantorial liturgy have brought him the highest recognition of his peers. He also performs as a concert artist and has composed many liturgical works which are sung throughout the world. He is known as an exponent of authentic and traditional music for the synagogue.

Cantor Louis Danto, who will also perform at the service has long inspired audiences in Canada and abroad. Danto is an international star, with a repertoire in Italian, Russian and French opera, as well as in Yiddish and cantorial music.

The Beth Tzedec and Beth Tikvah Choirs will be conducted by Gordon Kushner and Glick.

Four Canadian personalities will narrate the program, performers Marilyn Lightstone, Vivian Reis and Walter Soles, and Yiddishist Gerry Kane. They will read in Yiddish and English from poets Rachel Korn, Peretz Miransky, Simcha Simchovitch, Leon Kacerginski, Yitchak Katznelson, Abraham Sufskever and Morton Manila.

Marilyn Lightstone

As a child, prize-winning Canadian actress Reis performed in the Yiddish theatre. Lightstone has received numerous awards.

Also featured at the Yom Hashoah memorial evening are soprano Tracy Atin, cellist Coenraad Bloemendal, pianists Nadia Adler and Francine Kay, Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl and dancer-choreographer Shula Saltzman. The performers will interpret music by composers Ernest Block, Paul Ben Haim, Helen Greenberg, Israel Alter, Glick and Kushner, as well as anonymous melodies from the Shoah.

The program, presented under the auspices of the Beth Tzedec Holocaust memorial committee and the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, is free and open to the community.

NCJW project to teach breast self-examination

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A pilot project initiated by National Council of Jewish Women (NCJW), Toronto section, is planned to expand to other Canadian cities within the year.

Taking Charge By Taking Care is a project designed to teach women of all ages, from teenagers to seniors, the correct method of breast self-examination.

Toronto has three breast screening centres funded by the Ontario Ministry of Health for women 50 and older. The NCJW program was proposed by a Council member who had discovered she had breast cancer after visiting one of the provincial centres.

On April 10 from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m., NCJW will have its fourth Taking Charge By Taking Care session since the program was inaugurated last May.

"It's very non-threatening," NCJW Toronto section president Gita Arnold told The CJN about the atmosphere at each session. The sessions are held either on Sunday during the day or on a weekday evening.

For each session, four areas are set up for private 15-minute teaching appointments with trained nurse examiners at NCJW's Bathurst Street building. (Appointments may be booked by calling NCJW Toronto section.)

Women can relax over a cup of coffee and some baked goods while they watch the Ontario Breast Screening Program's video on early detection. Literature provided by the provincial program will also be available. There is no charge for the service.

Previous sessions have attracted women from as far away as Oakville and Bowmanville, and at least three women discovered breast changes and sought medical treatment as a result of participating in the program.

"If [breast self-examination] becomes a way of life, [women] will be able to tell if there's a change and will be able to seek medical treatment quickly," said Arnold. "It's really preventive medicine."

According to literature from the Ontario screening program, breast cancer is the leading cause of premature death of all cancers in women. Many women under the age of 50 have breast cancer, noted Arnold, although the risk increases with age.

A 30-year-old woman faces a one in 5,000 chance of developing breast cancer within the year, according to Dr. Judith Weinroth, medical coordinator of the provincial program's Toronto Centre. If you look at the risk over the next 10 years for the same 30-year-old woman, the odds are one in 238, she said, citing recent Canadian statistics. (The breast cancer rate in Canada is second behind the American rate, she noted.)

The chances that a 50-year-old woman will contract breast cancer within the year are one in 555; within 10 years, one in 50, said Weinroth.

"We really feel that this is a very important project," stressed Arnold. She noted that the project is not difficult to organize, but that each session costs between $2,000 and $2,500 to run (costs include building maintenance, refreshments and payment for the nurses). Organizers would welcome a donation of cots, Arnold said.

Representatives from other NCJW sections who will be in town for a national meeting will visit Council House on April 10 to learn how to set up similar programs in their own communities.

Yiddish conference reaches out to Kiev

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Winnipeg's Yiddishists are looking to Kiev for cultural support.

Among the resolutions passed at the recent annual conference of the Winnipeg Committee for Yiddish, was one calling for the Israel-based World Committee for Yiddish to try to arrange for some members of Winnipeg's Yiddish-speaking community to attend the World Committee session in Kiev in August.

"Yiddish has been lost in Poland," said Noach Witman, the Winnipeg committee's executive secretary. "In the former Soviet Union however, there are still two million Jews. They have preserved the language. There are meetings and cultural evenings going on in every town and city there. We feel the Kiev meeting may help us with our activities in Winnipeg."

Not that the Winnipeg committee has been inactive. Far from it, according to Witman, who reports that the committee held ten successful cultural afternoons or evenings, including two concerts, tributes to Peretz Miransky and Nachman Shemen (Toronto Yiddish writers who passed away last year) and a Sholom Aleichem evening. The community is blessed with a Yiddish choir, the Yiddish-speaking H. Leivick B'nai Brith Lodge and Witman's weekly radio show, his bi-weekly television show and his weekly column in The Jewish Post and News.

Seventy-five people attended the day-long conference at the Bnay Abraham Synagogue. They passed a number of other resolutions, in particular a call for all Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education elementary classes to offer some Yiddish language instruction; a yasher koach to the Holocaust Memorial Committee for planning a primarily Yiddish-language program during Holocuast Awareness Week; recognition of the H. Leivick Lodge, the Stay Young seniors choir and the Gwen Secter Creative Living Centre, for organizing monthly Yiddish programs; and a call for Yiddish-language television programming in Israel.

"We have had a lot of letters and appeals from Yiddishists in Israel for support," Witman said. "It hurts us that programming is available in German, French and even Spanish but that Yiddish in Israel is considered a strange language."

Conference to unite youth, seniors

TORONTO — A conference celebrating the International Year of the Family will provide an opportunity for young people and seniors to talk together and learn about each other in a variety of workshops.

Entitled, Talk To Me: An Intergenerational Exploration of Family Values in the 90s, the conference will take place at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, 1003 Steeles Ave. W., on Thursday, April 7 from 8:45 a.m. to 3 p.m.

If you are 60 years of age or over, or a student in high school, community college or university, this is an opportunity to get to know what the other generation thinks in a relaxed informal atmosphere.

The keynote address will be given by Robert G. S. Couchman, co-chair of the Canada Committee for the International Year of the Family.

The cost is $10 for seniors and students, including a full kosher (under COR supervision) lunch and refreshments. Registration is in advance.

For further information, call Judi Egelnick or Sheila Zane, at (416) 225-2112.

Winnipeg organizations seek unifying structure

WJCC extends 50 invitations

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — On March 6, 100 representatives of Winnipeg Jewish organizations met at the YMHA Jewish Community Centre for a day-long retreat, held under the auspices of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council, to discuss the community's governing structure.

"Our goal was to have input from as many community organizations as possible as to the challenges and strengths of the community," said Lorraine Bentley, the WJCC's director of planning.

"We were trying to develop some vision as to how the community views its future governance and ideas about dealing with the challenges and overcoming perceived weaknesses."

The WJCC extended invitations to every Jewish organization in the city, about 50 in all. Participants were divided into small working groups and asked to deal with issues such as leadership development, Jewish continuity and survival in Winnipeg, the role of the WJCC in planning and fundraising, and how to encourage the entire community to participate.

The results of their deliberations became a full plenary session led by Maxyne Finkelstein, director of community planning and allocations for Federation CJA in Montreal, with input from Shelley Maerov, executive director of Canadian Council of Jewish Federations.

"We came away with a general consensus that there is a need for more involvement by community organizations at council," Bentley said. "This was just the beginning of the process. We have presented a report on the retreat to the WJCC in which we recommend the process of consultation be continued. We are planning to hold some open forums to try to encourage input from people who are not part of the organized community and we will be holding meetings with major contributors and the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba to discuss financial aspects."

Women's studies group readies for second session

TORONTO — The Women's Institute of Advanced Torah Studies will be starting its second session on April 20 with an expanded list of courses.

The first semester, held during the winter, was even more successful than the organizers, Chana Weisberg and Goldie Plotkin, had hoped, with nearly 80 women participating.

Four courses will be offered in the spring term, with classes on Monday and Wednesday evenings, April 20 to June 6, from 8 p.m. to 10 p.m.

On Mondays, Weisberg will continue her course on Feminine Spirituality. A class on medical ethics will follow, where leading Jewish experts in the field will discuss such sensitive issues as euthanasia, abortion, transplants and surrogate motherhood.

On Wednesdays, Rabbi Immanuel Schochet, professor of philosophy at Humber College, will lead a class on the mystical dimension of Judaism. Ruchama Alter will then explore the teachings of the prophets.

Women may register for one or more of the courses.

Classes are held at Shaarei Tefilla Congregation, which, under the leadership of Rabbi Moshe Stern, is co-sponsoring the institute.

Plotkin and Weisberg explain that "the criteria for each course is that it be taught on a deep, scholarly and professional level by an expert in its field, and that the knowledge taught should add relevance and meaning to enhance the lives of today's women."

For more information, or to register, call (905)889-6066.

NA'AMAT TORONTO

Esther Rodzynek, newly installed president, Na'amat Toronto, hopes to raise awareness in young Canadian women about Na'amat's work. "It is well known that we care for Israel's children — tens of thousands of them — including teenagers in distress. But people are less aware that Na'amat is at the forefront of the campaign for social justice in Israel. It is Na'amat that leads the battle against family violence, that fights for justice for women who've been refused a Jewish divorce, that provides free legal aid to women in trouble, that struggles for women's rights. This is an organization that speaks to the hearts of today's young women and I am grateful for the chance to be Na'amat's president."

JF&CS hires Rabbi Weiss as head of chaplaincy services

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) has hired a director of chaplaincy services to replace Rabbi Sheldon Steinberg, who died last year.

Rabbi Ronald Weiss, currently spiritual leader of Beth David Synagogue in Binghamton, N.Y., takes over the pastoral duties at JF&CS in July.

Rabbi Weiss, 39, will be officially welcomed by the community at a reception on April 5 at 4 p.m. at the Lipa Green building.

He'll have his work cut out as the community's chaplain, visiting the sick in hospitals, residents in nursing homes and hospices, prison inmates and any JF&CS client who needs ministering from a rabbi.

Rabbi Weiss will likely complement the work of Rabbi Bernard Schulman, who recently took over as director of chaplaincy services at Mount Sinai Hospital, territory that was once covered by Rabbi Steinberg.

As Rabbi Weiss sees it, the role of the chaplain is "to recognize the well-being of Jews in institutions, or anywhere where they have social and spiritual needs.

"It's not only the act of bikur cholim (visiting the sick) but also tzedakah, which is normally defined as charity but more properly defined as righteousness," he told The CJN in a telephone interview.

Rabbi Weiss brings solid experience to the job. After receiving smicha (ordination) and a master's degree in Jewish education from Yeshiva University in New York, he served as Jewish chaplain at the Soldier's Home in Holyoke, Mass.

For the past nine years, he's served as a pulpit rabbi at Beth David, the only Orthodox synagogue between Syracuse, N.Y. and Scranton, PA.

Rabbi Weiss has personal ties to Toronto; his wife, the former Gella Sanders, has family in the city. The couple has four children, ranging in age from 18 months to 7 years.

Rabbi Ronald Weiss

He's looking forward to what he calls "the big city" and the rich Jewish life it offers.

"I'll miss the active rabbinate," he said. "There are few professions in which one can truly make a difference by touching people's lives every day.

"But I don't expect that to change. Chaplaincy offers as great, or greater, opportunities to touch lives and extend acts of chesed (loving kindness)."

The Kashruth Council has told The CJN that it is preferable to use Passover-certified spices on Pesach, including pure spices. This is because many companies continually change their methods and techniques of preparing spices, and chometz may become part of the finished product.

Commemoration calls for an end to discrimination

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — On March 21 — 34 years to the day after South African soldiers fired into a peaceful anti- apartheid demonstration at Sharpeville, killing 69 people and wounding hundreds more — about 100 people gathered in the rotunda of Toronto's civic Metro Hall to mark the anniversary and commemorate United Nations' International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination.

Ezrom Mokgakala, co-chair of the Toronto refugee affairs council, recalled the violence that he witnessed that day in Sharpeville and on many other occasions in his native South Africa. "There have been many more massacres and political murders in South Africa," he said. "Many thousands have died in the struggle against apartheid."

In describing the racist system of Pass Laws once used to keep black South Africans in a position of servitude, Mokgakala evoked parallels to Nazi restrictions on the civil rights of European Jews in the late 1930s and early 1940s.

The commemoration also featured a lively poetry performance by Nambitha Mpumiwana and remarks by Stien Lai, deputy minister of the Ontario Ministry of Municipal Affairs.

Noting that many of Canada's roughly 200,000 new immigrants annually settle in Metro Toronto, Lai said, "We have to change. If we don't, we will become irrelevant to the people we're serving."

Closing remarks were provided by North York councillor Bev Salmon, who is chair of Metro Council's action committee to combat racism. The event was organized by Sheine Mankovsky, race relations officer for Metropolitan Toronto, who told The CJN: "We've been having this commemoration annually for the last three years. We do it for a couple of reasons — first, to mark the International Day, and second, to address the evil of racism. We want to give people an opportunity to confirm their own commitment against racism and to rededicate themselves to rid society of racism."

The commemoration of the Sharpeville massacre was the first in a series of civic forums, workshops, exhibits and other anti-racist events that were scheduled to continue all week. After the Sharpeville commemoration, Bernie Farber, national director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, presented greetings from the CJC at a vigil sponsored by the Urban Alliance on Race Relations.

Yom Hashoah art exhibit

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Holoicaust art and memorabilia from the private collection of Dr. Morris Blajchman will be on view on the evening of the community-wide Yom Hashoah program at Adas Israel Synagogue on Sunday, April 10.

Born in Montreal to parents who emigrated from Poland in the late 1930s, Blajchman, a hematologist on the faculty of McMaster University medical school, began collecting Judaica as a means of learning more about his heritage.

"And you can't learn about your heritage without learning about the Holocaust," he observed in a recent interview at his home.

Having no extended family because his parents' families did not survive the Holocaust, Blajchman explained that he has nothing, for instance, that belonged to his grandparents.

Collecting Judaica compensated somewhat for his feeling of loss, but as he searched through antique and book stores in North America and Europe, he also became more and more interested in what he calls "anti-Semitica."

Inevitably, that led to the acquisition of Holocaust memorabilia, mostly in the form of documents, literature and art; but he also has military items such as badges, genuine SS armbands and other material.

Wherever he can, says Blajchman, he "clears out" stores of German military items "because I don't want them to fall into the wrong hands."

Among some 20 items he plans to exhibit, will be certificates issued to Hungarian Jews by Raoul Wallenberg, yellow stars Jews were forced to sew on their clothing, authentic SS armbands from Dachau and KAPO (Jewish camp police) armbands, identity cards and even a savings account card for a Jewish-administered bank at the so-called "model camp" of Theresienstadt.

Also on view will be paintings by Polish-born Israeli artist, Lior Roth, and Hungarian survivor, M. D. Weinstock; propaganda posters painted by Ben Shahn in 1942 for the War Information Office in Washington as an effort to combat American opposition to the war in Europe; and examples of pre-war support of Hitler, such as a 1935 front page from Father Charles Coughlin's publication, The American Gentile and a British poster carrying a full report of Sir Oswald Moseley's "Peace Meeting."

Among recent Holocaust-related art is a starkly compelling painting by Hamilton artist, Simma Krames, who is currently pursuing post graduate studies in fine arts at Brooklyn College, N.Y.

Entitled Nazis Eating Jews, it depicts a soldier about to eat a forkful of corpses he is scooping out of a bowl heaped with bodies. Two other soldiers look on, one of them nonchalantly smoking a cigarette, while around and above them swirl dozens more deathly white bodies.

Pointing out that Krames painted this when she was just 21, Blajchman marvels at her understanding and depth of feeling.

Another of her paintings, however, Zachor, showing a coldly cruel Hitler stroking a cat, will not be in the show for fear, says Blajchman, that "it might be too much for some people."

The Yom Hashoah program at Adas Israel Synagogue at 8 p.m., will feature as guest speaker former Hamiltonian, Steve Paikin, producer of last year's acclaimed TV Ontario documentary, Return To The Warsaw Ghetto.

To mark the 50th anniversary of the deportation of Hungarian Jews, candles will be lit by Hungarian survivors.

Rabbi Barnea Selevan of Ateret Cohanim shows tourists an inscription on the Western Wall just to the right of the prayer area. The inscription dates from 1,500 to 1,800 years ago.

Group wants to reclaim Old City

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —If the efforts of the Ateret Cohanim project are successful, the entire Old City of Jerusalem will once again have a strong Jewish presence.

The organization's stated goal is to reclaim formerly Jewish-owned real estate so that the schools and homes can once again be used by Jews.

American-born Rabbi Barnea Selevan, a spokesperson for Ateret Cohanim who was educated at Ner Israel in Baltimore and Santa Clara, Calif., is the fourth generation of his family to make aliyah. He and his wife Shoshana moved to Israel 14 years ago. They and their four children live in the Old City — outside the Jewish quarter.

Rabbi Selevan, who was in Toronto recently to raise both awareness and funds for Ateret Cohanim, is passionate about the need for the entire Old City to once again be a thriving centre of Jewish life. This part of Jerusalem, he insisted, was indeed Jewish until the British divided the Old City up into the Christian, Muslim, Armenian and Jewish quarters. What became the Jewish quarter — only eight per cent of the city — did not include the holiest Jewish sites, the Western Wall and the Temple Mount.

For many years, he said, Jews and Muslims had lived in peace, harmony and friendship in the Old City, in what became primarily the Muslim quarter. Jewish life flourished there, with yeshivot, stores (until the pogroms of the 1920s, most of the stores in the area were Jewish, he said), businesses and other accoutrements of Jewish life.

Jews left the area during the 1930s, sometimes handing the keys to their property to Arab friends, Rabbi Selevan said. For example, when Israeli troops recaptured Jerusalem in 1967, an Arab came up to a young soldier and offered him the keys to Yeshivat Torat Haim, a yeshivah founded in 1893. The Arab and his family had lived there and protected both the sacred objects and the 3,000-volume library. Ironically, the young soldier, Zerech Epstein, was a direct descendent of one of the teachers at the yeshivah.

Almost all of the students at the Ateret Cohanim Yeshivah in the Old City are IDF veterans. Some live there as well, and Rabbi Selevan insists there are many opportunities for more Jewish families to move into the area. Many Arabs, he insists, are happy to sell to Jews. Some are concerned about what will happen when peace comes and want the opportunity to leave. Some remember fondly the time when Jews lived there.

"It is just a question of money," he said.

While there is a security force in place to escort residents, Rabbi Selevan was emphatic that the area is safe for Jews — including women and children — to walk in. The more Jews who do move in, he believes, the safer it will be.

Several dozen buildings have been bought and are now occupied as homes, institutions and playgrounds, he noted, adding that he frequently takes tours through the Old City, where he is eagerly welcomed by Arab shopkeepers who benefit from the tourism.

Ateret Cohanim has had very bad press, the rabbi claimed, the best-known example being the controversy over Ateret Cohanim's takeover of the Christian-run building known as St. John's Hospice during Easter Week of 1990. In fact, Rabbi Selevan said, Ateret Cohanim had merely reclaimed a Jewish-owned but abandoned St. John's hotel — the hospice is several blocks away.

[A Jerusalem Post report at the time of the controversy identified the owner of the building as the Greek Patriarchate, who had leased it to an Armenian family. They, in turn, subleased it to a Panamanian corporation — which allowed a number of Jewish families and yeshivah students from Ateret Cohanim to move in. The Post story also stated that "seven or eight families" were living in the building at the time.]

In the current volatile climate, Rabbi Selevan said purchase is not strictly a legal matter. For example, he said, the Arab seller will often insist that the contract include clauses on supplying suitcases and airplane tickets, or the appearance of being forcibly evicted.

He related with some relish a story about one family who sold to Ateret Cohanim with every appearance of cordiality. As soon as the press appeared, he said, the women of the family began to wail hysterically that they were being thrown onto to street.

There is no reason for Arabs and Jews not to get along "if there is mutual respect and a clarity of identity and the recognition of each other's dignity."

Rabbi Selevan noted that it is particularly important for there to be a significant Jewish presence in all areas of Jerusalem in light of the current peace negotiations.

"The more Jews there are living there, the harder it will be to say Israel will have to give the city up."

Hebrew U provost outlines programs

TORONTO — Professor Michel Abitbol was in Canada last month to tell students, parents and administrators at Canadian universities about the new and existing programs at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem's Rothberg School for Overseas Students.

Provost of the Rothberg School since October 1993, Abitbol's visit included a meeting with the academic affairs committee of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, an information meeting for parents and students in Toronto, and meetings with the administration at the University of Montreal and Laval University in Quebec.

"The Rothberg School offers courses not only in English, but in French as well. I wanted to let Canadian francophone university students know about our programs," he said. Abitbol discovered, however, that these students were interested in studying at the Hebrew University, but they wanted to learn Hebrew and more English rather than French.

At the parent/student meeting in Toronto, Professor Abitbol joined Canadian academic affairs co-ordinator for the Hebrew University, Michael Litvack in speaking to more than 65 parents and students. The various programs, requirements and scholarships were discussed.

"The Rothberg School is concentrating on graduate level programs for non-Hebrew speaking students. One of the newest programs for overseas students is the One Year Graduate Program," said Abitbol. In its first year the program has attracted over 200 students from more than 60 countries. Seven of these students are from Canada. Students who decide to continue at the Hebrew University for a graduate degree can use the year to improve their Hebrew and to fulfil degree requirements.

In August, an international summer institute for graduate and post-graduate students from Israel and abroad will be offered at the Rothberg School. From August 1 to 18, four seminars will be offered in English by prominent members of the Hebrew University's faculty and scholars from abroad; credit will be given.

The One Year Program has always been a popular choice for Canadian university students. Changes are now being made to meet the different needs and requests of the students and their home universities.

As in previous years, the One Year Program students from Canada are involved in many of the extracurricular activities offered. "They are participating in volunteer programs, internships with members of the Knesset (Israeli parliament), seminars and more. The Canadian students are always a pleasure. Considering the many countries represented at the Rothberg School, Canadian students have a positive image that shines through every year."

For more information on the programs offered at the Rothberg School for Overseas Students at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, please contact Michael Litvack, academic affairs co-ordinator, Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, (416) 485-8000 or 1-800-668-3956 (Ontario and Quebec only).

Family Matters

John Syrtash, B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.

The Get: safeguarding the dignity of an abused custom

In March 1986, over eight years ago, Ontario established landmark legislation in its Family Law Act to assist agunah – Jewish women whose husbands refuse to consent to a get (religious divorce). In 1991, similar legislation was passed that applies across Canada, in the Divorce Act. Recently, the federal government permitted B'nai Brith Canada to release a formal study of the law's efficacy.

In a survey of several leading rabbis, lawyers and other professionals, over 66% reported a "substantial" reduction in cases where husbands were using their ability to frustrate their spouse's remarriage under Jewish law as a "bargaining chip" in negotiations on marital breakdown.

The educative and moral effect on Canadian-Jewish society has been remarkable. In my own practise, the issue of the "Get" has become considerably less serious than in the "good old days" when clients insisted on trading their consent to a "Get" for extra cash or more child-access rights or custody rights. In one such case, a woman forfeited her interest in a Florida condo for the Get. Without it, she could not remarry. Otherwise, the children of her "illicit" relationship could be considered "mamzerim" (bastards) who can only marry other mamzerim or converts. And the problem is then passed on from generation to generation, to the end of time.

New legislation ... and a new baby!

Many women across Canada have written to express their gratitude for the legislation. One observant woman told me that without the legislation, her new child may not have been born. Initiated by the Council of Orthodox Rabbis of Toronto (Va'ad Ha'Rabonim) and B'nai Brith Canada, the campaign for "Get" legislation was then heavily lobbied by these organizations. Other groups, such as the Canadian Jewish Congress and Toronto's Reform and Conservative Rabbis, then endorsed this initiative. This was a Holy coalition.

Their unity of purpose has not eliminated the problem. It has shown, however, that Canadian Jewry can be invincible when it speaks with a unified voice for human rights and justice. After receiving several international inquiries, it appears that Australia, England, Italy, and even Israel are considering similar remedial legislation. The State of New York also passed a recent law that bears some resemblance to Canada's example.

The law and the current situation in this country are not without their failings. Legal reservations about the law's constitutionality continue to be expressed, and there are certain women for whom the law has no application (such as a woman who has no need for support or property division). Most tragically, the community still hasn't organized itself to bring any pressure on spouses who resort to such tactics. But for all of these problems, the law has been successful, and we have only the Holy One (Blessed be He) to thank.

The passage of this law was miraculous. May He continue to help stranded women to regain the type of spiritual freedom that we celebrate this Pesach season.

AIDS documentary wins praise

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Corespondent

VANCOUVER — The first documentary feature ever made by young TV producer David Paperny was nominated for an Academy Award.

While Paperny may have been disappointed that he didn't win the coveted Oscar, he has the satisfaction of knowing that his production, The Broadcast Tapes of Dr. Peter, was recognized by the academy.

Paperny has already won the Jack Webster Award for British Columbia journalists and received best host, best writer and best documentary awards at the U.S. Cable Ace Awards.

A CBC documentary producer for the Evening News, a regional British Columbia show, Paperny is a native of Calgary, the son of Maurice and Myra Paperny.

He attended Calgary's Peretz School and after graduating from high school, he spent six months on a kibbutz in Israel. He and his family are members of Vancouver's Or Shalom Synagogue.

The Broadcast Tapes of Dr. Peter is a 45-minute version of a weekly TV show Paperny produced and directed, featuring Dr. Peter Jepson-Young, a physician suffering from AIDS. Dr. Peter, as he became known in the two years the show ran before he died, offered to do an AIDS Diary on the news show as an educational feature. The idea was encouraged by Dr. Jay Wortman, an official of the transmittable diseases control division of British Columbia.

Paperny was assigned to the show and although it was first proposed in June 1990, by September five tapes were ready and went to air. Despite objections by some religious and anti-homosexual groups, the show was a hit and it was decided to air AIDS Diary once a week, with Dr. Peter talking right into the camera without the benefit of an interviewer, telling of his battle with the dread disease while still trying to maintain a reasonably normal life.

In 111 diaries, viewers heard it all, including segments on how the virus ravaged Dr. Peter's body and a family discussion on funeral arrangements.

In 1992, CBC National, having heard of the success of the show, asked Paperny to do a full-length documentary on Dr. Peter, based on the tapes. The documentary even had a segment showing Dr. Peter visiting the burial plot he had selected. The national show ran on Nov. 2, 1992 and Dr. Peter died on Nov. 15, at the age of 35.

The CBC sold the show to Home Box Office (HBO), the U.S. cable network operated by Time-Warner. HBO asked Paperny to come to New York to re-edit the show for viewing in the United States. The repackaged show was titled The Broadcast Tapes of Dr. Peter and was first shown in a movie house in California in 1993, to qualify it as an entry in the Academy Awards, and then seen by a huge audience on the cable network.

In the HBO version, Paperny included a segment showing a memorial service for Dr. Peter. Paperny was asked to speak at the service and, with the approval of his rabbi, he and his wife recited the Kaddish — in an Anglican church.

Jewish singer Faye Kellerstein is a true Yiddishe Mama

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Faye Kellerstein poured so much heart into her rendition of A Brivele Der Mamen (A Letter to Mother) on the national CBC radio network recently that, far away on the Canadian prairies, a judge and his Jewish wife cried.

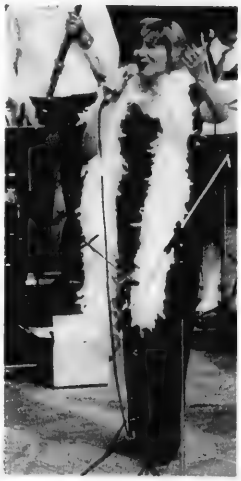
This incident, disclosed in a letter to the singer, followed Kellerstein's appearance on Vickie Gabereau's afternoon show and marked perhaps the first time that so many Yiddish songs went national.

The letter confirmed Kellerstein's own feeling about the song because she is unashamed in admitting that, to put her in the proper mood, she imagined herself singing A Brivele Der Mamen to her own two sons, Jeremy, 18, and David 16, as if she was the mother in Russia pleading with sons bound for America not to forget her, to write her a letter every week.

In fact, this Toronto singer of Yiddish melodies and folk songs, born in a displaced persons camp in Germany, has no qualms about identifying herself as a "Yiddishe Mama".

Even though she was a high school teacher for seven years at Bathurst Heights, she concedes, "My English still has an accent."

Her love of Yiddish takes a new direction in May when she and Nathan Garnick teach a course in Yiddish Theatre at the Institute of Jewish Learning at the Jewish Community Centre.



Faye Kellerstein

Certainly Kellerstein has been an effective ambassador for Yiddish, appearing on CBC-TV with the children of United Synagogue Day School at Beth Tzedec, and on the breakfast show on CITY-TV.

But it was her singing and erudite explanation of the language's history on the Gabereau show which struck home. The CBC radio host was fascinated by the story that And the Angels Sing came from a Klezmer folk tune of the 1800s that had no lyrics. Ziggy Elman adapted the music and Johnny Mercer wrote the English words. Not to be outdone, Kellerstein wrote her own Yiddish lyrics, and Un a Malach Zingt is one of the hits on her first cassette of Yiddish songs, accompanied by Jordan Klapman. In her toe-tapping and embraceable version, the Angel hovers beside two lovers who have been drawn together by fate (beshert).

Convinced that people in their 20s, 30s and 40s can be attracted to Yiddish, Kellerstein is planning an album of Yiddish melodies set to swing tempo, duplicating the success of Un a Malach Zingt, and another for children.

Advised by her parents, Chaya and Feivel Zuker, that the career of a singer was not the proper one for a Jewish girl, Kellerstein opted for school teaching instead. But after her three babies were born (she also has a daughter, Rebecca, 20,) she hired a baby sitter and joined a class at the Royal Conservatory of Music. "Now it seems okay for a Jewish girl to be a singer," she said.

Books

By BERNARD BASKIN

The Warburgs by Ron Chernow
Random House $39.00

This massive biography (820 pages) pays tribute to one of the most remarkable families in Jewish history.

In chronicling the world's oldest continuously active Jewish banking family, the author tells an engrossing and sprawling story that begins in mid-16th century Germany. By the close of the 18th century, members of the Warburg clan settled in the thriving port of Hamburg. There they put down roots and began to display the collective talent, energy, ingenuity and enterprise that led to gradual but inexorable success.

The fortunes of the family members waxed as they established their pre-eminence in Bismark's imperial Germany, the Weimer Republic, the Third Reich — until the Nazi upheaval — and beyond. Their intermarriage into the wealthy and influential Loeb and Schiff families made possible their entry into the American financial scene and their powerful impact on Wall Street.

The numerous descendants of the original Orthodox progenitors were — with few exceptions — talented, ambitious, charitable, enterprising and industrious. In the past three generations members of the family have included a Nobel Prize-winning scientist, an architect of the U.S. Federal Reserve Banking System, a close advisor to President Franklin Roosevelt, a founder of London's prestigious Warburg Library, a gifed concert cellist and a knighted advisor to English Prime Minister Harold Wilson.

A salient virtue of many of the Warburgs was their concern for fellow Jews in need of financial assistance. Over a 15-year period, Felix Warburg (1871-1937) — at a time when the dollar was worth much more than today — distributed over $13 million to 200 causes. In 1944, his widow Frieda Warburg (1875-1958) bequested the impressive family mansion on 5th Avenue to the Jewish Theological Seminary of America for a Jewish museum.

Members of the family held positions of prominence in a spate of organizations and institutions including the Jewish Agency for Palestine, the United Jewish Appeal, the Joint Distribution Committee, Youth Aliyah and the Hebrew University.

Although Otto Warburg (1859-1938) served as the third president of the World Zionist Organization, most of the family — although willing to help settle refugees in Palestine — were not Zionists. The redoubtable Jimmy Warburg (1896-1969) became involved in controversy when in 1958 he said, "If an American Jew deprecates the growing influence of the Orthodox theocracy in Israel, of the chauvinistic worldwide nationalism of Zionist leadership, or the treatment of the Arab minority in Israel, he is likely to be denounced as a renegade, if not as an anti-Semite."

Unhappily, the ties of the family to Judaism gradually eroded through assimilation and intermarriage. "Judaism had been the focal point for Warburg charitable and political involvement, tying them to transcendant causes and steering them away from the pursuit of pleasure that comes to dominate many rich families," Chernow writes.

"The American Warburgs found it harder to maintain the disciplined sense of duty amid material splendor that had been the historic hallmark of the family . . . Once emptied of spiritual content, Judaism became a series of onerous obligations. For a socially ambitious family, mingling with fancy gentile society, it was a barrier to social advancement, an unwanted burden from a darker past."

Chernow's first book, The House of Morgan, won the National Book Award in 1990. He writes gracefully and lucidly, never allowing detail to choke the narrative flow. The Warburgs is a notable achievement, panoramic in scope and brilliantly realized.

Choosing Village Park Was A Family Decision

Photos capture life in post-USSR

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — On a three-month tour of six former Soviet republics in the summer of 1991, Toronto photographer David Blumenfeld brought two 35mm cameras, more than 400 rolls of black and white film, and a deep mixture of reverence and curiousity about his own Jewish roots in the formerly Russian-dominated territories.

"My goal was to see what remained of Jewish life after 70 years of communism," says the 26-year-old political science graduate from York University, who also took a year-long photography course at Ryerson. "As well, since my grandparents are Eastern European, I wanted to find my roots. I wanted to go back and see where I might have been had they not left Eastern Europe."

Fifteen photographs, which comprise only a small sample of the results of Blumenfeld's photographic odyssey, went on view last week at the Joseph D. Carrier Art Gallery in the Columbus Centre, 901 Lawrence Ave. W. at Dufferin, in North York.

Entitled, Remnants: Jewish Life in the Former Soviet Union, the exhibition evokes a familiar theme — the decay and disintegration of Jewish life in places like Moscow, Minsk, Kiev, Lviv, Tblisi, Baku and Kuba, all of which Blumenfeld visited. Portraits like Mountain Jew, Georgian Jew and the trio of wizened grandmothers in Babushkas capture the wrinkled faces of survivors of a dying culture.

By contrast, stark religious portraits like Yeshiva Student and Matzos, and religious still-lifes like Cemetery and Know Before Whom You Are Standing, show that the religious iconography of this dying world has lost none of its power. Because its subject is an eight-day-old baby boy undergoing circumcision, Brit Milah implies continuity of tradition, but its harried confusion conveys tumult and uncertainty, not hope. Only a single photograph in the series — Aleph Beit, which shows a single young pupil learning the Hebrew alphabet — suggests the community may have a future.

Bearing affinities to the work of photographer Roman Vishniac and to Rembrandt in his use of darkness and light, Blumenfeld's photographs are powerful, expressive and moving. They remain on display through May 29 as part of a continuing exhibition of five Canadian photographers from different ethnic backgrounds who have focused on themes from their respective cultures.

Canadian Ballet Dancers Visit Israel: A company of dancers and musicians from the National Ballet of Canada is scheduled to perform in Israel in May, ballet officials announced recently. The visit is part of a five-week swing through Europe and Israel that takes in eight cities in four countries.

In its 43-year history, the National Ballet has never before appeared in Israel. It is scheduled to perform outdoors at the Sultan's Pool in Jerusalem on May 25 and 26, and in the Roman amphitheatre in Caesaria, May 28 and 29. John Cranko's dramatic full-length ballet Onegin will be danced in both cities.

The National Ballet is sponsored by the Ontario Ministry of Culture, Tourism and Recreation and various federal departments. Its upcoming tour to Europe and Israel has also been made possible through a generous contribution from the philanthropic Tanenbaum family of Toronto.

From China to the Bloor Street Y: An exhibition of paintings by Ester Ben is being shown at the Bloor Street Y (750 Spadina Ave., Toronto) from April 7 to 28. On Sunday April 10, the public is invited to meet and watch the artist at work from 11 a.m. to 12:30 p.m.

Born in Hong Kong, Ben was the fifth generation of her family to be born in China. Many of her paintings fall into what critics have described as a post-impressionistic, romantic realism. Colorful, and filled with contrasts and light, they seem distinctly Mediterranean in style, reflecting the strong influence of her travels.

Ben, who now resides in Toronto, spent six years in Israel in the 1950s, and has also lived in South Africa, Britain and the United States. Coming from a family of artists and musicians, she is also a qualified music teacher and performing pianist.

For exhibit hours, phone 924-6211.

Drabinsky Assists Theatre Students: Years ago, before his phenomenal success, Garth Drabinsky lectured on entertainment law at York University. This year the modern, entrepreneurial "Joseph" of the entertainment world has established the Garth H. Drabinsky Artist-in-Residence Program at York University to assist the theatre department in engaging specialists to provide an advanced level of professional training for students.

The first artist-in-residence is John Van Burek, a practising Canadian theatre artist with 20 years of theatrical experience. Van Burek directs the York Graduate Acting Ensemble production of Terra Nova by Ted Tally. It opens Monday April 4 in the Studio Theatre, Centre for Film and Theatre, York University.

In 1981, Nat Taylor, one-time Famous Players film mogul and Drabinsky's former partner at Cineplex, made a significant gift to York University, resulting in the campus's Nat Taylor Cinema.

Massey Hall Turns 100: Renowned for its superlative acoustics, Toronto's late-Victorian-era concert venue, Massey Hall, celebrates its centenary in June.

Performers and famed personages who have graced its stage include Louis Armstrong, Harry Belafonte, Charles Boyer, Maria Callas, Winston Churchill, Isadora Duncan, Bob Dylan, George Gershwin, Dizzy Gillespie, Glenn Gould, Jascha Heifetz, Danny Kaye, Charles Laughton, Gordon Lightfoot, Thomas Mann, Nellie McClung.

Vivienne Kugler, publicity and publications manager for Massey Hall, points out that performances of Shakespearean plays in Yiddish have also occurred in Massey's hallowed hall, as have boxing matches, typing contests, peace rallies, military musters, beauty pageants and temperance meetings.

This reporter has a childhood memory of performing at Massey Hall one Sunday afternoon as part of the Beth Emeth Children's Choir, one of several Hebrew school choirs to sing that day.

The former home of the Toronto Symphony until 1982, Massey has also heard performances of some of the world's great orchestras, including the Berlin, the Vienna, the New York Philharmonic, the Cleveland and Philadelphia orchestras, the Concertgebouw of Amsterdam and the Royal Philharmonic of London.

To mark the occasion, an all-Canadian musical extravaganza in being planned for the evening of Tuesday June 14. As well, a street festival and open house is being arranged for Sunday June 12.

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

The Hotel Inter-Continental on Bloor Street in Toronto recently hosted a press luncheon to inform travel writers of the Summer Spectacular program through which discounts up to 60 per cent are available at 43 of the chain's European properties. Not surprisingly, a recent Inter-Con survey showed that 79 per cent of travellers are most influenced by room rates when choosing hotel rooms.

Inter-Con's rates are generally inclusive of all taxes, service charges and a complimentary breakfast. (Readers of this column may be interested to learn that Inter-Continental is soon to open hotels in Moscow, Prague, Budapest and Warsaw.)

At the Inter-Con luncheon, I spoke with several members of the Canadian chapter of the Society of American Travel Writers (SATW), who had just returned from a conference in Israel. Those I spoke with said they found the Galilee region perhaps Israel's most refreshing area — the "least tense" and scenically the most beautiful. Several complimented Tel Aviv's beachfront and suggested comparisons with other great European beaches like the Riviera and the Costa del Sol.

Twenty-eight writers from across Canada attended the SATW conference in Israel, which unfortunately coincided with the Hebron carnage and resulted in a couple of last-minute changes to the group's itinerary in Jerusalem and vicinity.

"I enjoyed Israel very much," said Percy Rowe, travel columnist of the Toronto Sun and a past chair of SATW's Canadian chapter. "This was my fifth visit there. I've been going there for 25 years, and I saw a lot of changes. A lot of the idealism that used to be there is missing. At one time, visitors would be overwhelmed, not by the religious and historical sites, but by the sense of accomplishment of new Israelis. You don't really get that much now. It's a country that's been largely Americanized and showing the signs of its huge defence costs."

Negev desert

Rowe, who walked along the beach from Tel Aviv to Jaffa, also said he relished his time in the "fascinating" Negev desert. He spoke less favorably about Eilat, which he noted has attained a sense of being "hemmed in" since Israel relinquished control of the Sinai after the successful peace treaty with Egypt. Blocks of hotels and commercialized tourist developments now serve to isolate the beach, he observed. "Zoning controls, which seem to have been applied pretty well in Tel Aviv, need to be applied here," he said. "In Eilat, private enterprise has been allowed to plow ahead without any thought to the environment, and it shows."

Bike Tours of Israel: Touring by bicycle generally enables visitors to become far more intimately familiar with a landscape than traveling by car or motorcoach. Cycling tours designed for those who seek to see the Israel of yesterday and today are offered by the Israeli tour company, Beyond Biking.

Tours are available for both experienced and inexperienced cyclists, in groups numbering from 10 to 25 participants. Accompanying riders is a support van containing a repair station and mobile kitchen.

Seven Summer Programs for Students: Kibbutz Encounter, Israel on Ice, Israel Trek and Cycle Israel are some of the tours to Israel for students, offered by the Canadian Zionist Federation's Israel Youth Program Centre.

Designed for 17-year-olds, the $4,350 Israel Dimension offers visits to historical, cultural and other sights across the Jewish nation, June 27 to August 10. Kibbutz Encounter (June 29 to August 10, $4,250) gives 15- and 16-year-olds a lively kibbutz experience plus visits to regions from the Golan Heights to Eilat. The Student Summer Tour (June 29 to August 8, $4,100) and the Student Summer Tour Express (May 18 to June 22, $3,400) offer young adults a dynamic kibbutz experience and cross-country tours.

For further information on these and other options, contact the Israel Youth Program Centre in seven major Canadian cities including Montreal (514) 481-0218, Toronto (416) 398-6931 and Vancouver (604) 257-5141.

Jewish Genealogy Seminar: As mentioned previously in this column, a full and impressive roster of European and Israeli speakers has already been announced for the International Seminar on Jewish Genealogy, which takes place at the Jerusalem Crowne Plaza, April 29 to May 5.

Late additions to the program, not previously announced, include Professor Dr. Jerzy Skowronek, state archivist of Poland; Dr. Igor Sakharov, head of the St. Petersburg Institute of Genealogy (to discuss research into some 700 Jewish shtetls); Arno Parik, formerly with Prague's State Jewish Museum (Czech and Slovak sources); and Dr. Minna Rozen, head of the Diaspora Research Institute (research in Turkey).

Marine museum a true Haifa jewel

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

HAIFA — One of the little-recognized jewels in Israel's crown is the National Maritime Museum here in Haifa.

Israel is situated at the crossroads of ancient seafaring. In 1953, the National Marine Museum was founded to increase knowledge and interest in the area's marine history. From its crowded premises on Hanamal Street, the museum moved to its present building at 198 Allenby Rd.

The museum is made up of four floors housing a large hall, office, a 200-seat auditorium, workshops for restoration, classrooms, a 5,000-volume library, and work rooms for research.

Two exhibition floors illustrate 5,000 years of maritime history. The rare and varied collections record man's efforts to master the sea.

One section features model ships built from paintings, tomb reliefs and ancient literary sources. There is an Egyptian sailing craft from the reign of Pharao Sahure (circa 2500 BCE), a Canaanite merchant ship (1400 BCE), the prototype of the Tarshish ships mentioned in the Bible, and models of ships from the Byzantine Era, the Middle Ages, the Age of Great Discoveries and modern history.

Jewish shipping is stressed. The Hebrews were a maritime people from the earliest times, when the Israelites moved down from the hills to the Mediterranean coast. Under David and Solomon, Jewish interests moved to the Red Sea and beyond. Proof of Jewish seafaring is well-documented in the collection of ancient coins, pottery, decorative emblems and wall drawings depicting.

There are displays of marine archaeology with pieces dating back 4,000 years, many of them storage jars found by fishermen; marine mythology, with figurines in bronze and terracotta illustrating the deep belief in the powers of the sea; a coin collection dating back to the 5th century BCE; and navigation instruments from the 15th century.

A section on cartography contains more than 1,000 old maps and atlases published in the last 500 years. There are also sections on ships in art and stamps. A section on modern shipping is in the advanced planning stage.

An Egyptian funeral boat (20th century B.C.E. at the National Marine Museum in Haifa.

Museum director Dr. Nadav Kashtan pointed to a special exhibition titled Mysteries of the Sea: Gods, Creatures, Monsters. "From the beginning of history the sea has been considered not only a force of nature, but also a challenge to mankind and a route for travel and commerce," he said.

"It is a source of religious and artistic inspiration, and ancient civilizations [saw the sea] as an expression of the power of the gods over the universe and over human destiny."

Spa helps to balance work, body, health

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Any season is the right season for a rejuvenating vacation at Safety Harbor Resort and Spa.

But never more so than when we begin to shed those heavy clothes and see what's underneath. The mirror, scale and our lack of energy tell us it is time to take our lifestyle in hand and get back into physical and mental shape.

A phone call for reservations and a direct flight to the shore of Old Tampa Bay will take you to Safety Harbor Spa, for generations a favorite retreat for Canadians.

Spas were once for the rich and famous, or havens for older folks. But times have changed. More and more younger people are becoming aware of the need to balance work, family, body, mind and health.

A stretch class at Safety Harbor Resort and Spa near Tampa, Florida.

Safety Harbor Spa is a tropical oasis in which one can re-evaluate physical and lifestyle needs, says spa director Bina Kumar.

Kumar says the philosophy at Safety Harbor is one of moderation. "The simpler — the more enjoyable — the easier it will be to become part of your lifestyle. [A spa should] motivate, reiterate or kick-start us into the lifetyle that we would like to find ourselves in."

Kumar, the second generation to run Safety Harbor, doesn't not believe in self-deprivation. "You can splurge on something you love and the next day you moderate with exercise and low fat."

The comfortable family atmosphere allows guests to devise their own schedules. You can choose from three levels of exercise classes in the 100,000 sq. ft. fitness facility, or aquafitness classes in the indoor and outdoor pools.

Guests stretch, tighten and relax their muscles while outside oak trees drip with Spanish moss. If you like to move on your own, training rooms are available with rowing machines, treadmills and exercise bicycles.

Nutritious meals using little fat are served in the gracious dining room. The spa presents lectures on healthy foods and substitutions, cooking demonstrations, seminars on stress management to help you shop, eat and live healthier.

There are a host of services available including massage, soothing herbal wraps, loofah salt rubs, whirlpools, facials and many more. And if you enjoy the outdoors, the spa is located on a 22-acre waterfront property just minutes away from the historic Odette Philippe Park, a nature paradise which is great for walking or cycling (the spa provides bicycles).

Add to all of this tennis courts, a driving range, a conference and meeting centre, on-site medical facilities, and access to the nearby performing arts centre, the movies or shopping.

You take home from Safety Harbor a new attitude toward fitness as an essential part of maintaining life's balance. And you will probably notice there is more of a skip in your walk, and a smile on your face.

Searching for copper needle in desert haystack

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel's chemical extraction industry along the shores of the Dead Sea has been big business for a long time, predating the creation of the state. In 1992, $650 million (US) in a variety of commercial chemicals was extracted, accounting for about five to six per cent of the country's manufactured exports.

But a Toronto-born geologist who has poked around the arid Israeli countryside for the past seven years believes the country's mining industry has overlooked a huge copper deposit lurking just beneath the surface.

Putting his money where his expertise is, 38-year-old Avrom Howard has obtained an exploration concession from the Israeli government to prospect for what he hopes will be a goldmine of copper.

Howard, along with a group of unnamed investors, is incorporating Canada-Israel Mining and Exploration Ltd. (CIMEL) to carry out the search in the area southwest of Timna in the Negev Desert.

With 15 years' experience as a geologist, Howard believes his specialized expertise gives him a leg up on his counterparts in Israel.

Geologists in the Jewish state are experts in locating industrial minerals such as potash, phosphates, building stones and salts, he said. But because so little in the way of metals like copper, silver, lead and zinc are mined in Israel, Israeli geologists are not as adept at ferreting them out.

The Dead Sea/Red Sea geologic formation is part of the great East African Rift System, a major fracture (100 km deep) in the earth's crust, he said. These cracks have allowed magma (molten rock) to come to the surface over time and created a unique chemistry of rock that can be rich in certain metals, including copper, diamonds and uranium.

Howard said his research and comparisons with similar geologic formations around the world has led him to believe that there are "huge... exotic-type" copper deposits in the Negev. There is evidence, he says, to suggest the deposit could be on the same scale as the Olympic Dam find in Australia, one of the world's largest.

Geologists who have worked on the Aussie site have looked at his data and concur with his conclusions.

With that in mind, his company obtained a one-year, renewable exploration permit for a 158-sq. km area southwest of Timna. Using a mix of primitive pickaxes and sophisticated geophysical sensors slung from the bottoms of helicopters, Howard is preparing to go "on the ultimate treasure hunt."

He says, however, that while there is "great potential there, . . mineral exploration is the proverbial search for a needle in a haystack."

He hopes that by this time next year a first exploratory drill will be in operation, to be followed by other drillings. If all goes well and his hunch is right, commercial mining could be well under way by the turn of the century.

Howard estimates CIMEL will spend about $500,000 (US) this year to get the ball rolling, and more in the future. Mineral exploration is highly capital intensive, with costs of up to $100 million to start a mine not uncommon. Howard said some of that will be generated by private investors and perhaps through a stock offering as well.

A third possible source is from large multinationals which often rely on small companies to explore and locate the deposits and then infuse large doses of capital for a piece of the action.

Israel will benefit from any mine that opens by receiving annual license fees, income taxes from the mining company and its employees and royalties from the metal extraction. There are also many side benefits including the generation of other business in the area, Howard said.

And if the price of copper goes down by the time the mine is ready to open?

Howard isn't worried. Copper is one of the most widely-used elements in industry, he said. There are about 60 pounds of it in every car, it's widely used in home construction, and industrializing countries will create a strong demand for it long into the future, he believes.

The Israeli government has granted Avrom Howard explorations concessions.

School software package

By SHARON KANON
Special to The CJN

ASHKELON — School administrators can now obtain facts and figures they need with a mere push of a button, thanks to an innovative software package developed in Israel.

Called Logos, it enables principals and other school personnel to cut paperwork and time in their search for information about classes, teachers, pupils, grades and behavior. The impact: improvement in the day-to-day running of an educational centre and fewer hassles during peak pressure times. Moreover, administrators are able to analyze overall as well as individual trends and performance.

Included in the integrated Logos system is Schola, software for management of school data, and Libre, for library data. Software for accounting/financial data will be ready for marketing shortly.

With completion of beta-testing for the French version in Paris, the company will launch its marketing efforts, and an initial system will be installed in a school in Switzerland. An English version is also ready for distribution.

B.C.'s employment increases

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — Employment increased in British Columbia at a rate of 2.9 per cent last year — three times faster than the rest of Canada, Lt.-Gov. David Lam told the B.C. Legislature at the recent opening of the spring session.

Lam said investment in the province grew at a rate of 8.4 per cent, more than five times the national average. "We can take pride," he said in his speech from the Throne, "that we have the fastest growing economy in the country."

Lam said the province can expect record population growth "will put more pressure on our urban communities, our environment and government services."

He said business will need well-trained workers to expand and compete in the global economy and called for greater emphasis on skills training to prepare the workforce "for tomorrow's jobs."

A new ministry of Skills, Training and Labor has been established to strengthen skills training. There will be new apprenticeship and work experience opportunities to better prepare high school students for the world of work.

The lieutenant-governor said the government will expand child care services with 7,500 new spaces in the next three years. "This will enable more parents to take full advantage of job or training opportunities."

As the province evolves into a more knowledge-based economy, said Lam, "we must increase our investment in advanced research to attract high-tech industries like telecommunications and biotechnology. . . . The government will be building a new partnership with the private sector to help expand these industries."

Lam said discussions on social programs must shift to whether they are relevant, effective and accessible. "It costs us all when people fall through the social safety net," he said. "The B.C. government believes that we can't afford to lose that social safety net.

"Consequently, the government will lead in shaping the future of our social programs. The premier will sponsor a Forum on New Opportunities for Working and Living to bring the people of B.C. into the discussion. Together we will design the future of the social safety net and the security we provide for all British Columbians."

Lam said the government will impose a three-year tax freeze "combined with increased tax enforcement, and pressure on Ottawa for our share of federal revenue."

Project provides quality family housing

By STEPHANIE CHAPMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Givat Canada (Canada Hill) is not just another housing project, says managing director Phil Beinhaker of Beinhaker/Irwin Associates, affiliated with IBI Group.

Situated in Jerusalem, Givat Canada provides quality family housing in an urban area comparable to that of North America.

Traditionally, Beinhaker explains, land in Jerusalem was too precious to accommodate low density housing such as the one proposed by the IBI Group.

Valleys are protected as green spaces so building is confined to the hills. Infrastucture costs are high so more units per hectare are required to make development economically feasible, Beinhaker says.

The IBI Group solution: build a series of different designs that terrace up the hill or clusters of townhomes in a stacked arrangement. The effect: more costly but private homes.

Beinhaker says the project was designed with nature preservation in mind. He cites a particular grove of trees turned into a park and play area built onto the crown of the hill.

He describes the drivable streets as having "the atmosphere of a pedestrian walk with trees and attractive landscaping."

Given the environment, Beinhaker says the project seemed to grow out of the hill. Even parking was broken up and integrated with car ports that sport vines and other vegetation. Everything became part of the landscape, he says.

The project was started in the late 1980s, and consists of 300 units to date. The next phase of 64 units has begun and two remaining phases of 60 units each remain. "We've had a positive response in the marketplace," he says. He is looking for a larger opportunity in the Jerusalem area.

He says rather than constructing housing, the firm has built a neighborhood that responds to the needs of area families.

"Comparatively speaking, the Israeli economy is aggressively making money. As Israel becomes a sophisticated economy and competes with businesses in Europe and North America, it is learning to be competative in the services industry and industry services," Beinhaker says.

Beinhaker was willing to share some advice with those looking to do business with Israel.

He stresses that business participants have to be personally involved or have someone they trust involved in the entire process.

"You can't be an absentee operator." It is impossible to control the process without understanding the rules, the language, the consumer and the market regulation, he says, adding you have to be responsive and adaptable.

Firms also have to understand the scale they will be operating on is smaller. "It's a small economy and a small country — smaller than Ontario," says Beinhaker. He cites the financial difficulties he faced his first year in Israel until he broke his housing project down into smaller phases.

Finally, Beinhaker says Israel is a country subject to radical changes in consumer taste. While similar changes may be charted in larger countries, there is less advance notice in Israel. As well, these shifts occur more often.

Israel holds many benefits for investors. Beinhaker cites the country's geological location and a skilled workforce as example. He adds that the Israeli economy will be further strengthened when they develop technical schools to serve the building industry.

The IBI Group, with more than 300 people, is a multi-disciplinary consulting organization specializing in planning, transportation and systems design.

The continuity of professional practice within the firm dates back to the 1960s with the first collaborative efforts involving the principals. IBI Group under its current structure was established in 1974.

Israeli food producers seek new markets

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Israeli food producers are no longer satisfied with only supplying the relatively small kosher market abroad. The industry has undergone a major modernization and expansion in the past number of years and is seeking to export a wide range of products around the world.

The Israel Economic Mission to Canada recently held seminars in Montreal and Toronto on Israel's new and improved food industry in the hope of finding new markets and partners for joint ventures, as well as to spread the word about Israel Food Week May 9-12 at the Jerusalem Convention Centre.

Benjamin Noy, Israeli consul for economic affairs to Canada, said that in 1992 Israeli food export to the United States totalled $129 million U.S., of which $55 million's worth was processed. That figure represents a five per cent jump in one year alone.

The largest increases were in wines and spirits (up 74 per cent), confectionery (55 per cent), dehydrated vegetables (16 per cent) and bakery goods (15 per cent).

Canada directly imported $12.7 million U.S. in food items from Israel in 1993. An additional 20 per cent entered Canada via the United States.

Worldwide, Israel exports $1.1 billion in food. The European Community is the destination of about 70 per cent of Israel's food, North America 15 per cent and Japan 5 per cent. Eastern European markets are growing, and talks have opened with China, Noy said.

Israel Food Week will serve as a showcase for new varieties of produce, adaptations of ethnic foods derived from the country's multicultural cuisine, and engineered foods like soybean-based meat substitutes. The industry is also paying more attention to packaging and making products visually appealing.

The event is intended for food importers and brokers, supermarket executives, caterers, food service professionals, and food journalists.

Gourmet chefs

Approximately half of Israel's processed food exports are based on citrus products, following in descending order by canned and frozen vegetables and fruits, meat products (especially poultry), confectionery and baked goods, and wines and spirits. Last year, the food processing industry employed 50,000 people, and produced $6.7 billion in products.

All food exports are supervised by Israel's own regulatory bodies and, in every area, the industry offers products approved by American authorities, such as the FDA. Most products are kosher, bearing the 'U' or other stamps.

Who would have thought Israel would be making for export fine cheeses, pate de foie gras, frozen pizza, surimi seafood (kosher imitations), spirits such as vodka and brandy, spring water, Christmas and Easter chocolate novelties, and even ginseng, the herbal remedy favored by the Chinese.

Israel is trying to capitalize on the demand for natural, healthful food. Many producers boast that their goods are nutritious and free of additives.

The seminar's guest speaker, Gerd Stern of New Jersey, president of the new Israel Food Importers Association of America, said the world is not aware of the varied cuisine of Israel, which reflects its "melting pot" culture.

Israel also has a new generation of gourmet chefs that have encouraged a demand for more sophisticated food, he said.

Canadian importers may find, as he has, that kosher products are sought out by many non-Jewish consumers. "People who have no [religious] reason to eat kosher do so because the kosher symbol has become like the Good Housekeeping Seal of Approval. It's a symbol of quality."

He stressed that Israeli companies are seeking partnerships with their counterparts abroad, and not only to buy and sell. "Israel is learning to deal in international markets, but there are still problems. The Israel Export Institute has the official job of making these relationships work."

The Israeli food companies invest heavily in the research and development of new products, and enjoy the expertise of a large pool of food technologists from many countries.

New Canadian Issue

TORONTO — The latest investment option from State of Israel Bonds has a distinctly national flavor.

The new Canadian Floating Rate Issue Bond (C.F.R.I.) is the only Bond available in Canadian funds. The minimum subscription is $5,000. Investors can purchase larger denominations in additional units of $2,500. Interest is paid twice yearly at three quarters of a per cent below the Canadian Prime Rate.

The C.F.R.I. which matures in 12 years but can be redeemed early under specific conditions, is transferrable to a spouse, brothers and sisters, children, parents, grandparents and grandchildren.

It can also be assigned to a synagogue or any other registered charity under the Double Mitzvah Program, in which the owner receives a tax deductible receipt for the current value of the Bond, from the recipient organization.

Capital Access For Small Firms

OTTAWA - An Ontario Liberal Party task force on Access to Capital for Small Business was launched this month by Ontario Caucus Chair Joe Volpe, M.P.

The task force has examined the access to capital issues and identified a number of areas of concern, Volpe said.

Specific areas of study include: small business profits; financial institution loan losses and financial institution profitability; systemic barriers; statutory regulations; sectoral lending practices; tax laws and government programs.

The task force, chaired by Andy Mitchell, M.P. for Parry Sound-Muskoka, will identify reasons why small and medium-sized businesses are having difficulty obtaining capital and recommend actions which should be undertaken to correct the problem.

Toronto Shows Merge

TORONTO — Organizers of the 1994 Spring Boat Show, which was scheduled to take place at the International Centre March 25-27 announced that the show has been merged into the Cottage Life Show which shares the same dates and location.

The difficult economy, particularly in the boating sector, meant many exhibitors were unable to commit to participating in the show, said Steve Barber, vice-president of Industry Trade & Consumer Shows Inc., producers of the Spring Boat Show.

The previously sold out Cottage Show will now expand to encompass those boating exhibitors who were confirmed for the boat show and will also include Wind & Surf '94 which will feature exhibitors of windsurfing equipment.

Market Recovers Slightly

JERUSALEM — Israeli investors are hoping the latest bounce in the market reflects the end of the bear market which began in February, rather than just another temporary reprieve from the mauling they have suffered.

Shares on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange (TASE) fell more than 10 per cent recently, the equivalent of a nearly 400-point drop in New York's Dow Jones Industrial Average.

The West 'Bank'

JERUSALEM — The Bank of Jordan has received a license to open its doors again on the West Bank.

The license, granted last Wednesday, enables the bank to re-establish a West Bank presence for the first time since the 1967 Six-Day War.

The bank's first branch will open in Ramallah, with others scheduled to follow.

Banking sources also note that talks with local businessmen in the territories about establishing a Palestinian bank in the West Bank are also progressing.

Centre promotes business ventures

By GAIL LICHTMAN
Special to The CJN

ISRAEL — It makes good sense to do business in Israel.

This is the message that the Centre for Business Promotion has been sending to the international business community since its founding in 1991 by the Israel Ministry of Industry and Trade. Now, with the coming of peace, that message is being echoed by interested enterpreneurs all over the world, as Israel begins to look more and more attractive as a springboard for technological and economic opportunities.

"The peace process is influencing the investment and business climate more than anything else today," says director Gad Soen. "It is removing both psychological and other barriers to international trade with Israel. In the past, many companies didn't want to do business with us because they considered the Middle East unstable and a potential war zone."

For example, during the Gulf War, says Soen, one Japanese company which did business through an American company, decided that it didn't want the development of its product carried out in Israel.

"Now the situation is changing," he continues. "These days we get requests for information from companies in the United States, Europe, Japan and the Far East which used to shy away from doing business here. They think they might be missing out on something. Of course, this process will take time to bear results. But it has begun."

Offering a wide range of services for businesses seeking to set up subsidiaries and/or joint ventures with Israeli companies, the Centre's data bank lists some 800 Israeli companies interested in foreign investment. So far the diskette has been distributed to more than 3,000 interested parties.

"When I met recently with a German business delegation, with the touch of a button I was able to show them a list of 50 Israeli companies looking for business co-operation in Germany," says Soen.

In conjunction with the Israel Export Institute, the Centre has organized business opportunity conferences and seminars in the United States, Poland, Hungary, Japan, Austria, Germany and Czechoslovakia. It has also organized missions abroad for Israeli businessmen.

"Representatives of five of our companies went to Singapore," says Zvi Goldstein, director of the Israel Association of Software Houses — of which there are more than 120. "The Centre screened potential partners for our members and they were able to get into serious discussions without wasting time sifting through maybes and ifs. Two are about to sign agreements with Singapore companies."

On the flip side, the Centre has brought foreign business delegations to Israel to explore joint ventures, strategic partnerships and investments with Israeli companies. "We had similar success with an Italian delegation that came to Israel," says Ben-Zvi. "Three contracts were signed."

One of the problems in evaluating the Centre's overall effectiveness is that it has no follow-up data. "It is very hard to get stastistics," said Gabi Bar, Director of Information and Foreign Relations for the Centre. "While companies do not hesitate to let us know when they are interested in contacts, they sometimes prefer to close business deals without letting the government know. Even though we would like to know about these deals, it's really not vital. And the companies are not obligated to tell us."

A recent survey of the companies listed in the data bank, showed that some two-thirds of those interested in strategic partners from abroad have been in contact with foreign companies during the past year. Seventy-five per cent said the Centre led to this contact.

Of those responding, 130 Israeli companies said they received one to five inquiries from abroad, 45 received six to 10 inquiries and 70 received more than 10 inquiries during the last year.
